One incident, however, of a very melancholy character, I shall note, which transpired about three hours after I left your town. I allude, of course, to the accident which resulted in the death of WASHINGTON BARRACK, superinduced by the switch tender. At the moment the casualty occurred. I was seated in the hindmost car, and consequently felt but little of the shock which the front cars received. Still the concussion was sufficiently great to bring the passengers simultaneously to their feet, who, panic-stricken, made a rush for the doors. On reaching the wreck of the engine and baggage train, I discovered the body of poor Barrack between the wheels of the tender, his body under the car, and his shoulder and chest fairly upon the rail. I scarcely think the tender wheels passed over him, and yet his position was such as to warrant the assumption that they had. I reck, and had it placed in one of the cars. The detention consequent upon the accident, pevented us from making connection this place, at the Odd Feilows' Hall, next with the morning train for Elmira, N.
