Poetry.

BY WM. CULLEN BRYANT.

And is gone

A soft, repining sound, Where forest leaves are bright

And fail like flakes of light, To the ground.

It is the autumn breeze, That, lightly floating on,

Just skins the weedy leas.

Just surs the glowing trees,

He means by sedgy brook, And visits, with a sigh, The last pule flowers that look,

From out their sunny nook, At the sky.

O'er shouting children flics

And wanders now to make

By distant wood and lake, Where distant fountains break From the ground

That soft, uneasy sound

No bower where maidens dwell

Mourn'st thou thy homeless waste?

And away.

Is no more.

And must leave.

Not on the mountain's breast,

THE LAY OF THE DIRECTORS.

Who, when the times were good and bright,

Made Railroad shares appear all right?

Who, when my money was paid in, Assured me that the road must win

Who made the costs increase so fast.

And shared in contracts long and vast, And filled their pockets to the last?

Who flattered me with hopes of gains From "branches," "air lines," "lightning trains,"

And "feeders" leading to the mains?

Who know the arts of financiers,

Who, when the chance seemed rather blue For dividends and enrnings too.

"Cooked" the accounts to make them "do,"

And charge fat fees as endorsers, And turn at pleasure, "bulls" or "bears,"

Who, when grave doubts arise in this,

A large per centage on the "tin!"

And speculation at its height,

The wind that stops to rest

For all the glorious things

That light October wind,

And, kissing cheeks and eyes, He leaves their merry cries Far behind.
