I did so, and we departed. For several days i saw little more of the Count, but I; did not wonder as I knew his house was tilled with noble friends and relatives, and that he was making preparations for a splendid and costly fetc, to be celebrated in his extensive gardens. Many of the pea-antry and humble classes of Dusseldorf were to participate in the gayletics, and my mother talked of nothing but the grand concert in the evening-the pavilien creeted for the purpose, and the Italian prima donna, who would give the rete's. She was greatly elated when a special invitation arrived for all the family, with the promise of a carriage for Paul and myself.

It was a lovely evening in the early summer. The stars shone brightly overhead, and a cool, sweet breeze stole through the open windows, and played around us as we rode along. Paul raised his sightless eyes to the calm blue sky, and an expression of mingled love and thanksgiving glowed upon every other busine-s, painfully uncertain .his pale face.
