DROOMS .-- 100 - Doz. Brooms, at Whelesale Dec. 12, 1857. Locust street. Poetry.

Gone Away. I see the farm house, red and old. Above the roof its maples away;
The hills behind are bleak and cold,

The wind comes up and dies away. I gaze into each empty room, And as I gaze a gnawing pain Is at my heart, at thought of those . Who ne'er will pass the doors again.

And strolling down the orchard slope, (So wide a likeness grief will crave.) Each dead leaf seems a withered hope, Each mossy hillock looks a grave.

They will not hear me if I call: They will not see these tears that start; 'Tis autumn-antumn with us all-And worse than autumn in my heart. O leaves, so dry, and dead, and sere!

I can recall some happier hours, When summer's glory lingered here And summer's beauty touch'd the flowers Adown the slope a slender shape Danced lightly, with her flying curls,]
And manhood's deeper tones were blent

With the gay laugh of happy girls. O stolen meetings at the gate!

O fingerings in the open door!
O moonlight rambles long and late!
My heart can scarce believe them o'er. And yet the silence strange and still,
The air of sadness and decay, The moss that grows men the sill
