

THE COLUMBIA SPY.

SAMUEL WRIGHT, Editor and Proprietor.

"NO ENTERTAINMENT IS SO CHEAP AS READING, NOR ANY PLEASURE SO LASTING."

$1.50 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE; $2.00 IF NOT IN ADVANCE.

VOLUME XXIX, NUMBER 13.]

COLUMBIA, PENNSYLVANIA, SATURDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 2, 1853.

[WHOLE NUMBER, 1,470.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY MORNING

Office in Northern Central Railroad Company's Building, north-west corner Front and Walnut streets.

Terms of Subscription.
One Copy per annum, if paid in advance, $1 50
If not paid in advance, $2 00
No subscription received for a less time than six months, and no paper will be discontinued until all arrears are paid, unless at the option of the publisher.
Money may be remitted by mail at the publisher's risk.

Rates of Advertising.
One square (9 lines) one week, $0 25
Three weeks, 75
One month, 1 00
Three months, 2 50
Six months, 4 50
One year, 8 00
Large advertisements will be made at quarterly, half yearly or yearly rates, and are strictly confined to their business.

Poetry.

The Silent Cable.

The cable the cable
When will it be able
To break this long silence of death?
What if it be found
That the poor thing is drowned,
And cannot recover its breath?

Or perhaps it keeps mum,
And pretends to be dumb,
Just like the old crow in the stable;
It takes gentle flattery,
And not fault and battery,
To make people communicable.

But (the figure to change)
It need not seem strange
If it turns out a poor speculation;
For the cable was found,
And quite likely to fail,
Or go into, at least, liquidation.

Indeed, it had failed,
Before the ships sailed;
'Twas completely "round up," as we learn,
When it left the Green Isles;
Though it floated awhile,
It soon proved a sinking concern.

And now we begin,
Though its "ships have got in,"
To see it is really "round up."
Alas, for the cable!
It will never be able
To make both ends meet any more.

Well, it isn't much matter,
For if it could chatter,
To believe it we need not have been able;
For since Atlantis,
There's nothing been high up
That streaks and for like that cable.

Besides, it is right
That to work out of sight
In fishing for strange information,
By mysterious plunges,
The way they get sponges?
'Tis a species of deep-dive-ation.

Yet, we honor the genius,
Who bore the expense;
They knew that their shares when they got 'em,
Represented, no doubt,
What would soon be paid out,
And speedily go to the bottom.

Mr. Field is a hero,
And "dam spurs spurs"
Will serve very well for his motto,
He has dropped a long line;
Won't the wire make a sign?
For if it don't answer—it ought to.

But hush! here it comes,
And thus the word runs:
"Dear Jane!—will you excuse it?
This day is all wrong,
But my pen is so long
I'm just finding out how to Huzzah it."

Selections.

The Wife of Two Husbands.

When I first came to Woodilee, I came as errand, for the incumbent was nearly ninety years ago, and very infirm. I had a hundred pounds a year, and the little cottage that is now in ruins, close by the old church to live in, and never dreamed to have done better. That would have been enough and to spare, indeed—without my good wife here and the four little ones of course, who then were not in the question—for the place is not a dear one as to living. The Brent, which runs by our door, supplied me well with trout, and I was my own fishmonger. A knife and fork too, were always laid for me at the squire's board, and on Sundays without exception, I was there to use them. The Sunday after poor Mr. Metville, the old incumbent died, I was as usual at the Grange and as was natural, our talk fell on his loss and on the future vicar.

"I have appointed one in my own mind," said Mr. Markham; "and if he chooses to accept the living, as there is no reason whatever for the delay, he will read himself in within the month or so—a young man not over rich, who knows the people here, and is well liked by them."

"I fear then, sir, he will not want a curate, since the parish is so small?"

"No, I fear not Granley. We shall be sorry to lose you, although we have seen so little of each other; but I will have you in my eye, be sure as will my wife, in whose way curacies come somehow more than they do in mine."

And so we parted for that time with a hearty handshake.

Ah, what a wife that Mrs. Markham was!—a fair, blithe woman then, with auburn hair just dusted over with gold, and wearing her thirty summers like a flower. She with her pleasant smile, was the fit messenger to tell me ere the month was up that I myself was the new vicar of Woodilee. She took as great delight in bringing the news as I to hear it.

"The vicarage is yours," said she; "and may this please you Mr. Granley, as it pleases us. It was not with my will that it was kept a secret from you so long, but you know my husband loves his kindly joke."

It was not likely after this, that I should become less their friend; and indeed the Markhams and myself were forever together. Both as clergyman and familiar intimate, my intercourse grew very close with them indeed. I learned, with pains enough, even to join their little concerts in the hall; I read with them old plays in winter evenings; and the vicarage was almost less my home than was the Grange. I am not sure that they did not choose my wife for me; if so, I have the greatest gift of all to thank them for; and they stood both of them as sponsors to my eldest boy. About two years after I had been installed as vicar, I began to observe a great strangeness in Mrs. Markham. She grew absent, started when addressed—especially if by her husband—wasted visibly, and lost in part her pleasant looks. The squire did not see this; she had always a smile to greet him with, however she might look to others; and would watch him sometimes when he was not regarding her, with a concentration of affection in her gaze more intense than ever. Another change was this: the squire's fortune being very large, his wife had a most liberal allowance, and kept quite a little establishment of her own. Her charities, besides those that were in common with his, were extensive. When any persons needed help beyond that which I was justified in giving, I had been accustomed to apply to her as readily as to him; but now her alms at first diminished, and then altogether ceased. She parted under some frivolous pretence, with her carriage and ponies; and from being rather fastidious and choice in her attire, she came to dress with great simplicity, and almost ill, so that upon that point her husband rallied her. One night she was singing with us in the hall as usual, a favorite Scotch song of his, that she had sung a hundred times before, when her voice suddenly trembled, as though her heart was breaking, and she burst into a fit of tears. It was one of those exquisite melodies of Burns upon the domestic affections; and Markham spoke touchingly to me afterwards of that excessive fondness of his wife's for him which had so completely mastered her. "If I were to be taken from her," said he, "I do believe dearest Jane would die."

Certainly to watch her anticipating his slightest wish, and listening to his every word as though it were to be his last, it might well seem so. Upon my venturing to remark to him that she was generally in no means good health, and not in her usual spirits, he thanked me, and was nervously alive to this at once; and thinking a little company might cheer her, he sent for his maiden sister from the north to spend some time with them—a quiet elderly lady, very excellent, but not in any way gifted as her brother and sister-in-law were. We two struck up an acquaintance very soon, and the squire was wont to make facetious allusions to it which would have been embarrassing from anybody else. She soon fell up, in some measure, that position of Lady Bountiful in the parish which Mrs. Markham had abdicated—although I confess she somewhat lacked the gracefulness of her well doing—and evidently to that lady's satisfaction. It left her more to herself, and at liberty to retire to her chamber or elsewhere, as had now become her favorite custom. This combination, with the other peculiarities in her conduct, although still veiled from her husband's notice, did not escape the quick, womanly eye of Miss Markham.

"I cannot think," said she, as we were taking a walk together about three weeks after her arrival; "what change has come over Jane. If I did not know herself and George to have been the most loving couple that ever breathed, I should be inclined to think her an unhappy wife, and if I were not thoroughly convinced of the badness of her late husband, that she was regretting his loss."

I had never heard until that moment of Mrs. Markham having been a widow, and I expressed my surprise strongly.

"Indeed?" said my companion, "I had made certain that they had entrusted you with that revelation; but since you are aware of so much, you may now just as well know all."

"Mrs. Markham, whom you perceive, even at this time, charming and almost perfect being, appears extraordinarily sensitive or suspicious of evil, was, as Miss Jane Raby, romantic to the last degree. She eloped from school at the age of seventeen, with an adventurer named Heathcote. I never saw him myself but I have been told that he was a youth extremely handsome, and gifted with some attractive but superficial talents.—After living together a short time in great unhappiness, so far as Jane was concerned, he deserted her, and sent her back to her friends. He did not appear again for years. He must have treated the poor girl very brutally, to account for the horror and absolute loathing which she entertained for him. He knew that she did so, and used that knowledge for his own profit. He had openly boasted that "he had not married a milkop like her for nothing, but for her money;" and the moment which secured her her property, the very day on which she came of age, brought this happy to her side again. She bought him off with ransoms, then and at many other times, as the civilized nations of old time bought off the savage, and with the like result—he became more frequent and extravagant in his demands. When I say that he was a systematic gambler and a drunkard, I believe that I have mentioned only his lighter follies. The relics of her original fortune only remained to her, when he required of her a blank check to be filled up at his own pleasure. This, backed by her paternal uncle, and sole relative, in whose house she was then residing, she steadily refused to give him; and Heathcote, uttering the most frightful threats, was obliged to content himself with a draft drawn by Mr. Raby upon his own banker for a hundred pounds. He drew it merely to save his niece, who was in an agony of terror from her husband's violence, and to get the man out of the house as quickly as possible; but as the matter turned out, this was the luckiest thing in the world. Heathcote altered 'one' upon the order to 'five,' and the number '100' to '500,' and so got the check changed by the commission of a felony. The next time that this fellow came for his merciless tax—which was soon enough—Mr. Raby had a policeman in waiting for him. "If," said that gentleman, "you ever again attempt to persecute my unhappy niece, I transport you for the term of your natural life. You may thank her alone that I suffer you to escape just punishment this time.—If it rested with me only—and luckily the proof of your penal crime does rest with me, and with no 'milkop'—you should be shipped off as soon as the law could ship you." Heathcote hectoring a good deal, and strove to obtain an interview with his poor wife; but Mr. Raby was firm. He told him out one hundred five pound notes, and enclosed them in a cover, whereupon he wrote his own name and address to remind him of this compact, telling him that it was the last handwriting and the last shilling of his that he should see. The conditions of gift were, that the recipient should depart from Australia forthwith, and never set foot again in England. "The fellow five hundred, the forged check, sir, is in my own possession, and if I ever see your face again, it shall be produced in a court of law—which penalty to other, there being no help for it, agreed to. Heathcote's brutality must have been something excessive to have trodden all traces of love out of a heart like Jane's; but he had quite succeeded in so doing. Although she had not consented to her uncle's threat being held over him—and happy was it that it did not rest with her to use it—she could not but feel comfort from the event. Six months' experience of freedom did wonders in restoring her roses and lightening her heart of a sorrow that seemed likely to crush it altogether. She began to move about less like an automaton, to wear the smile of content, if not merriment, and to be in some sort like the Jane Raby of five years before. Then came some news which made her serious and silent awhile, but which would scarce have made her sad; Heathcote was dead in the bush, slain by the hand of one of his own wicked companions. In a concealed pocket within his vest was found the roll of bank notes in their still unbroken cover. It had escaped the eyes of his murderer, or the passing by of some honest searcher had disturbed him in his unfinished search. They forwarded the parcel to Mr. Raby, with a narration of the facts. A year after this event, it would have been impossible to recognize the spirit-bowed and fragile Mrs. Heathcote in the by no means insupportable widow which she had then become. Thanks to her brief matrimonial career, she was not rich, but beautiful and happy as you see her now, Mr. Granley, or rather as you did see her until within these few months. My brother married with the full knowledge her former life, and has never had a moment's cause, as he says himself, to regret his choice."

This narration which the kind hearted but mis-dubbing little old maid made piquant with various garnishments of her own in the way of flings at the foolishness of young girls, and the fatality of her early marriages, did not much enlighten me as to what was ailing poor Mrs. Markham, although it increased my interest in her fortunes. Her conduct towards myself remained unaltered, or was marked by even greater communicativeness. She put to me several hypothetical cases of conscience, of which I could see no possible bearing on herself, and begged me, as a clergyman, to give her my best opinion on the subject.—She told me that she had often bewailed the having no children, which she had once considered to be the sole blessing denied her; but that now she thanked God she was childless. The horrible thought began to cross me that my dear benefactress and firm friend was going out of her mind; and that idea grew stronger, although Mrs. Markham shook her head at it, and hoped it might be no worse.

She was as good a person as ever lived; but she had the weakness of her order, which somehow is always to think the worst that can be of all her sex. But when I had seen Mrs. Markham come out of the firewood, under the sandalif, a little after sunrise one morning, and she told me, pale as a spectre, and quivering in every limb, that she had only been to get an appetite for breakfast; when she asked me at another time for the loan of twenty pounds for a very pressing emergency, and begged me to keep it secret; and when I coupled with these things her piteous endeavors, so transparent to myself and her sister-in-law to conceal her unhappy condition at all times—a mark most significant of an unseated brain—I felt quite sure of my painful crime being but too true. I was endeavouring how to break this horror to Mr. Markham, that remedial measures might be resorted to before it was too late, when a circumstance occurred which changed my suspicions into a certainty even still more terrible.

It was on a Tuesday, in the midsummer, and the squire was gone to a meeting, likely to be a stormy one, upon education, at the neighboring town; Miss Markham, ever desirous of a little shopping, had accompanied him, and I had intended to have done so likewise, had not the illness of a parishioner suddenly prevented it. His case required certain ailments which was not within the scope of our resources at the vicarage, I walked down to the Grange, according to custom to request that they might be sent to the sick man's cottage. Mrs. Markham was not within; but the beauty of the afternoon enticed me upon a terrace, the extremity of which communicated to the walled garden. The gate was always kept locked, I knew, and only the squire and the head gardener had the keys of it. Sauntering slowly along upon the turf, and drinking in the prospect dreamily, I had reached the extremity of the walk, and was about to turn, when I heard the whispering of voices. I could not see who the persons were, for they were behind the wall in the garden close below me. They had no business there, I knew, and had probably come after some very choice melons of the squire's.—I made no scruple therefore of listening; but after the first few words I felt as though I would have given both my ears rather than have done so.

"I tell you Jane, that now or never is the time. There is a heap of money in his desk to-day, which will go to the bank tomorrow. Markham is away at Ruffham, and it will not kill him when he comes to find it gone."

"Never!" said a clear full voice, which I knew to be Mrs. Markham's. "I will die first. I will go away with you yourself, before I would rob my husband."

"Your husband!" said the other with a sneer. "Pooh, pooh! you need not be so squeamish for a few pounds, since you are in for so many pennies already. Why you've made free of hundred—"

"Not a shilling, she interrupted vehemently—"not one shilling have you touched of mine. My own luxuries, my comforts, the wants of God's own poor, have gone to support your prodigality; but not one penny of his, heaven knows!"

"Jane," said the ruffian slowly, "take you good heed to what I say; I'll blow upon you and tell all to his face. I'll carry you off—I swear it, before his very eyes. What you have known of me hitherto is nothing to what you shall know of me when you and I come to live together again." I seemed to see and feel through the wall itself the shudder that ran through that poor lady's frame at these words. If I had thought the worst of her, instead of being assured, as I then was, that her wicked husband Heathcote was indeed alive, and persecuting her with a power more terrible than ever, my heart would not have bled for her less painfully, my indignation against him would not have risen higher; but as it was, my teeth were grinding in my wrath, and my stick was fitfully gripped, as though it were a sword. Silently, like a thief in the night, I stole down to the wall, and setting my feet in some convenient crevices, peered cautiously above it. Both luckily had their faces turned away from me; but I could see, even on the man's back, scoundrel and coward were written. His poor wife's wrongs and goodness, and all that I had heard of his brutality, swept over me in a sea of indignation. Oh, for one quarter of an hour of my college days, before I had put on that ecclesiastical garb! Oh, to have given him ever so brief an example of that 'one, two,' in which I remember to have had some skill, in the bygone time. My years and profession indeed, were already so far forgotten that I rather wished he might just have laid his hand upon her in his rage. My stick was an ash-wood one, and would not have broken for some time, I think. He wanted to do it, I could see by the twitching fingers; the bowed and trembling, but still graceful figure—the appealing sob, for which I could only guess the meaning—the young life withered and struck down in its joys by his cruel threats and presence—they moved him not one jot. I dated not trust myself to look any longer, but resumed my station at the foot of the wall. After a storm of menaces, met by almost hysterical expostulations, that grew fainter every moment, I heard him say: "You know where I am to be found, woman; and if what I demand does not come to my hand within the next eight-and-forty hours, I come to this house as surely as you are my wife, and claim you." I heard a fall upon the ground, and knew that his poor victim had fainted; but I waited until the wretch—who heeded her no more than if she were a log—had left the garden and plunged swiftly into the copse that fringed its northern side. I ran in then at the open door, lifted Mrs. Markham from the path, and revived her at the spring which flowed hard by. She was afraid, on coming to herself, to look up at me, taking me for Heathcote; but I told her how I had walked in, seeing the gate open, and expecting to find her gardening, and how I feared the heat had been too much for her. She was ice-cold, poor thing; but she murmured—"Yes, the heat, it was the heat," as I supported her homeward up the hill. I got away immediately, and pretending a telegraphic message, packed up a little carpet bag, drove down to the railway station at full speed, and arrived in time for the up express, as I had hoped.

On the next Wednesday at noon I was back again, and once took my way down to the Grange. Mrs. Markham had been very ill, I heard, and was now no better; the squire was even then at her bedside.—I sent for him on the plea of very urgent business, and he came down into the library at once. If I had not been in his own house, and expecting to meet no other but himself, I would not have known him.—His eyes were swollen and dull, his gait tottering, and his features white and drawn like the face of a dead man. She had told him all his first and only love, his true, devoted wife, the partner of six happy, happy years, was to be torn from him by another, and doomed to a life of misery.

"Granley," said he, in a hollow unnatural tone. "I have that to tell which will wring your heart, I know—it has already broken mine." He had fallen into a chair like one whose limbs refused to sustain him, and the tears coursed down his cheeks unchecked and uncontrolled.

"Markham," said I, "I know all—everything—more, I think, than you can tell me. Your agony is not for yourself, but for your wife—far her, I am well assured. She shall not be dragged away. Be comforted. He shall never touch a hair of her head."

His despairing eyes turned towards me not without a touch of hope. I was about to speak further, when the front door bell rang gently.

"The man has come," groaned the poor squire, as if inexorable fate had laid its hand upon his shoulder.

"Show him in," said I to the servant, for his master seemed to have lost all power of speech. For my part, I drew a hopeful augury from that delicate bell-ringing; a ruffian that had nothing to fear would have pulled with both hands.

Heathcote slouched in with an insolent air, half sneer, half bluff.

"I don't want the parson to hear what I have got to say to you," were his first words.

Mr. Markham, who kept his back turned towards him, waved his hand to me in a sign that I should speak for him.

"You may ask whatever you will," said I quietly. "I am aware of the object of your coming; you want to extort the money from this gentleman, which you tried to persuade another to steal from his own desk?"

"Oh, she told, did she?" said the villain with a diabolical smile. "It will be the worse for her, presently, that's all."

"No, sir, she did not, if you mean your wife, Mrs. Heathcote. Ay, sir," added I as he started back, "we are aware of all that and very much more. You were overheard in the garden. There is more than one thing known, wretched, Henry Heathcote, of your old doings, which you are not aware of."

I saw him turn as pale as the poor squire himself. "Whether or no," said he after a little, "I shall have the money or I shall have my wife—who has committed bigamy—whichever that gentleman there pleases."

"That gentleman," said I, as I observed Mr. Markham was about to speak. "It is not to be intimidated, month after month, as Mrs. Heathcote was, in supplying your bottomless purse. Nay, sir, your oath is not to be trusted. I hold in my hand a warrant for your apprehension, procured yesterday from Hampshire by Mr. Raby, upon a charge of forgery, the proof of which I now have with me. The consequences are upon your own head, remember, and when you leave this house, it will be for a jail."

"I was quite prepared for this, sir," said the ruffian with a look of indescribable malice. "Mrs. Markham that was, will, however, accompany me to prison. Fine food for the scoundrel of the county, that will be; and a good convict's wife she will make to me in my banishment without doubt."

Mr. Markham writhed like one in torture upon his chair. We were indeed in the man's power, as he said, and my journey into Hampshire had been of but little service. One desperate course, however, which had been suggested by Mr. Raby, was left to me, and I tried it. "Miserable man," said I sternly, "do you then dare to force us to extremities? You scoff at banishment, but what say you to the gallows? you—" I strode up to the trembling wretch, and laying my hand upon his shoulder, whispered aloud—"you murderer!"

The sweat stood out upon his pallid brow, his knees smote together, and his hair seemed absolutely to bristle up, so abject was his terror. "Mercy! mercy! I never found the notes," he murmured.

"No," said I; "but here is the packet"—and I produced it—"and red with the blood that still cries out against you!" At the sight of this frightful evidence, the coward knelt upon the floor and covered his face with his hands.

"Rise wretch—go!" thundered the squire, who had risen up like a man returned to life from the grave. "Here is money—the sum that you demanded—take it. If ever again these eyes of mine light on you, as were as there is a sun in heaven, I hang you."

The cast-down, half-paralyzed figure of

Mr. Markham seemed to dilate as he said these words; he looked like some incarnate Nemesis denouncing certain vengeance upon the creature at his feet. It gathered itself up like a stricken hound, seized the proffered notes without daring to look up into the donor's face, and rushing out of the door and from the house, as though the executioner was even then upon his heels, sped away under the flaming eye of noon from Woodilee, for ever.

Mr. Raby's guess had been a true one.—The pocket of Heathcote had been picked by one of his wicked companions in the bush, and he had murdered the thief for the purpose of recovering the packet. This having been found upon the body, had been judged conclusive to identify it with his own remains, and for these so many years he had not dared to show himself in civilized part to gainay it, but had lived the man-ruining life of a bushranger. Tired of this, and having by a successful pillage obtained money enough for his transit homeward, he had ventured back to England.—Finding his unfortunate wife well married and in such great happiness, his hatred of her was rebuffed, and his determination strengthened to persecute her all hazards. The poor lady had never before had strength of mind to reveal his existence, and now her confession, and the certainty of having to leave her beloved Markham for this dreadful husband, had brought her into the most dangerous state. She had prayed for death more fervently than any dying man for life; when, therefore, the squire had carried up to her the result of my interview with Heathcote—for he did not needlessly distress her with the account of his new atrocity, and of the means whereby he had finally got rid of him—she was almost beside herself with joy. Her gratitude towards me was without bounds, and as she strove to raise her attenuated form her cough to receive and thank me, tears choked her utterance. The squire was but little more composed. With their mutual confidence, which had been but this once broken quite restored, and their very life-blood, as it seemed, set once more flowing in their veins, it fell to me to wake them from their dream of new-found happiness, by reminding them of the real position in which they stood. The reaction from the extremity of despair to the certainty of safety, had been too great to admit of any thoughts, save those of unalloyed content. Good and Christian man as the squire was, the circumstances of Mrs. Markham being still the lawful wife of Henry Heathcote—whatever that man's character might be—and therefore making her continuance at the Grange impossible, had never once occurred to him. The man having been thoroughly got rid of, and all idea of personal annoyance at an end, Mr. Markham had dissociated her in his mind from all relation with her first husband at once. The poor lady must have indeed thought often of the sad case, but had put it from her, probably as something too horrible to be dealt with justly. Nevertheless, she was the first to see the rightness of the path which it was my duty as a clergyman to point out to both of them. If ever there was a case where spirit and letter seemed at war—if ever one where innocent error seemed to be more terribly avenged than crime itself—I acknowledge that it was this of theirs. My heart was wrung for them to its core; but I had no glimmer of doubt as to what was necessary for them to do. Tenderly, but firmly, I put it before them; and before I had done, Mrs. Markham signed to me that it was enough. "I go," said she, "dearest George, at once, while I have still strength to travel."

"The vicarage, madame, is of course your home as long as you please."

"I thank you, dear Mr. Granley, but I leave Woodilee," said she, "as far behind as possible, this very night."

"And I," chimed in the good little old maid, whom we had almost forgotten, she had been so silent a spectator—"and I with you, sister Jane, to the end of the world, if you will. She is my care, George, from henceforth, for I have wronged her in my heart."

The squire's grief was terrible to witness, but he made no opposition. Mrs. Markham had a small estate in a distant county, to which it was arranged that the two ladies should immediately remove. Boxes were hurriedly packed, the travelling chariot ordered to the door; and, after such a leave taking as I trust does not often fall to the lot of mortals, the invalid was lifted in, in a fainting state, and borne away swiftly into the night. Darkly, indeed, it fell upon the Grange, where the widower was left mourning for the wife that was still alive. Weeks and months passed by, but he would not be comforted. The sketch book on the table, the piano in the hall, the flowers that her graceful hand had tended in and about the house, the garden wherein she had loved to busy herself, her favorite walks, the very prospect her soul had delighted in, were robbed of all their charms for him at once. Tears, instead of smiles, sprang forth at the sight of them; horror was born of them instead of joy—skeletons of their former selves, wherefrom the glory had departed, and into which the life was no more breathed. As kind and as good as ever, his cheerfulness seemed quite to have forsaken him, and he was growing old at heart and grey on head and face. Mrs. Heathcote—for she had reassumed her former name—never wrote one line to him, nor he to her; but his sister corresponded with the squire daily, and to receive those letters, and to talk with me and others who had known her of his departed wife, was his sole pleasure.

It was some two years after the separation of Mr. and Mrs. Markham, that I exchanged my vicarage at Woodilee for the summer months, on account of the sickness of my eldest child, for a parish on the sea-coast, and with much difficulty, I got the squire to accompany us. The novelty of the mode of life and some excursions on the water afforded him most amusement. I persuaded him to take them continually.—One evening, while he was thus employed, I was suddenly sent for from the beach, to see what could be done for a poor fellow who had fallen off the cliff. He was the messenger told me, as we hurried along, a well known accomplice of the smugglers involved in this accident, it was supposed, while signalling to some of them the approach of a revenue-cutter. A little crowd had gathered round him on the shore, but not evincing that sympathy which is usually felt among the poor in places of that sort for victims to the execrable laws. They had, however, furnished him with a mattra, and were giving him water. He was speechless, and scarcely sensible, they said; but a glance at his terrified eyes as I came up, convinced me to the contrary. Mangled as he was about the head, and altered by what appeared to me to be the certain approach of death, I recognized the wretched Heathcote at once. He was borne, by my directions, to the nearest cottage, and a man on horseback dispatched for medical help, although I saw it could be of little avail.—I remained by his bedside all through that night, and it was a fearful one. When the doctor told him that, without doubt, he was a dying man, I thought it would have killed him on the instant. "I have done everything that is horrible, and nothing good my whole life long," he said. I gave him such comfort as I could with truth afford him, and urged him to penitence and prayer. His murder, his felony, and whatsoever other crime he may have committed, did not seem to oppress him so heavily as his treatment of his poor wife. "An angel, an angel," he repeated, "and I was a fiend to her. Markham, Markham, he will make her happy yet—Poor Jane! Poor Jane!" were his last words. When, after his burial, I told the squire this, he was affected to tears. "My hatred of that man," said he, "has stood between me and heaven, I believe; but I forgive him all."

In twelve months' time from that forgiveness, he stood within this church upon the hill at Woodilee, and was married afresh unto Jane Heathcote by me. It was a happier day than any of us had hoped to see at the Grange again. The only person who shed a single tear was dear little Miss Markham; but that is her way of expressing intense satisfaction. Not a villager was there who did not rejoice in their joy, from the ancient clerk of eighty years, who kissed the bride's hand at the door, to the little school children who scattered flowers before their feet. There is very little else to tell. Besides—see, there comes tiddling up to us a little fellow before whom nothing further must be said: a pleasant looking, handsome lad, with the smile—the old-sailor that is worn again now—of his mother.—Once upon a time, I remember, she said that she was happy not to have him; but they were both glad at the Grange, too, I think, to welcome the young squire.

The Crescent of Gold.

A LESSON FOR LITIGANTS.

Among the innumerable islands which stud the Mississippi, there are two of moderate extent but of unparalleled fertility.—Wild oats grow there in abundance and without cultivation; the trees are loaded with cones of nutritious nuts, and the bushes themselves produce in abundance fruits known under the name of sand plums.—This fertility attracts the elk and the wild goats which furnish the hunter with prey; in fine, the bays formed at intervals in the circumference of the two islands, are frequented by myriads of white fish, which can be caught without any difficulty.

Each of these islands had, however but one inhabitant. The inhabitant of the Green Isle was named Maki, and the one of the Round Isle was called Barbo. As their domains were but a short distance apart, they visited each other often in their bark canoes, and lived on pleasant terms. Maki was the best hunter, and Barbo the most skillful fisherman; so they exchanged their booty with one another, and thus the comfort of both was much increased.

In short, their tasks were the same, their riches equal; both lived on the products of their island; both lived in a hut built with his own hands of turf and branches of trees; both had for clothing only the skin of the elk which they had killed, and as ornament only the feathers of the eagle, or the dried grains of the box thorn.

But it happened one day that Barbo, in cutting up the fish that he had just taken, found in the entrails of one of them a half circle of gold, ornamented with stones of different colors. A civilized man would quickly have recognized the crown of one of these elegant combs with which the Mexican woman then ornamented their head-dresses; but Barbo had never seen anything like it. After having danced for joy at the