

Among Mr. Whipple's illustrations of intemperance, in his address at Suffolk, says the Christian Secretary, was an incident which, if we had e read it, had escaped from our historical recollections. At one of the battles during the Peninsular war, the Duke of Wellington had occasion (or at least thought he had) to reprimand an Irish regiment for its poor behavior in the fight. Stung by the report, the regiment asked to be tested by being assigned the post of special danger in the next engagement. The request was complied with; the battle proved to be one of the fiercest of the campaign, and that regiment were shot down at their post to a man. After the fight, the Duke, in passing over the field, came to the spot, and as with some twinges of conscience he surveyed the mangled and bloody heap, all at once one of the bodies arose slowly to move. With extreme difficulty the head succeeded in lifting itself upon an elbow, and turning its eyes upon the General, opened its lips, and in unmistakable native accent and tone, sung out, "Hurrah, ye hookey-nosed scoundrel, are ye satisfied now?" It is perhaps needless to add, that Wellington took instant measures to have the poor fellow extricated from the gory mass around him, and though terribly mutilated, his wounds were most carefully dressed and his life saved. Until quite recently, it is said, the man might have been hobbling about, an object of special curiosity to visitors at one of the prominent English hospitals.
