THE Number for January, 1863, begins the Eleventh Volume of the Atlantic Monthly. From the commencement, in 1867, the Atlantic has rapidly increased in circulation, and it now has the largest class of readers since its beginning, say years ago. Its prosperity stendily augments, and it continues, amid atlithe fluctuations and dangers incident to our national crisis, to gain ground in the estimation of the public. At a time so pregnant with events which touch the future destines of America in every vital particular, the Publishers and Editors do not deem it necessary to promise that its pages will never swerve from the lonest paths of loyal patricular, and universal freedom. Its opinions have always been on the side of Liberty. Frogress, and Right, and the course it first adopted in its early cureer, will ever be faithfully imminatined. nantailied.

The £1.000 Note.

Mr. Douglas was in business. Not so far from the Bank as is Snowdon's summit from its base was Mr. Douglas's establishment, which he contemplated with great satisfaction-as, indeed, he well might, for he windows displayed an amount of jewelry and costly articles "unequalled" (as might be learned from the covers of contemporary magnzines) "by any house in the world"-"in the world, sir!" would Mr. Douglas say to his acquaintance, putting the expressive noun in large capitals. Mr. Douglas had risen from the ranks to his present position, and it was his wont to boast he had never made a bad debt, or was "done!" I was once remarked, in his hearing, that to get the best of him one must rise very early in the morning. Whereupon Mr. Douglas said, "They mustn't go to bed at all, sir; and then they couldn't do

We have shown sufficient of Mr. Douglas for the purpose of the present narrative .-He was but the type of hundreds of our shrewd tradesmen. It was noon: he was in his counting-house, and the broad thoroughfare was througed with equipages, one of which drew up before his door, and a mild-looking gentlemen in undress naval uniform alighted from the carriage and walked into the shop. Mr. Douglas looked over the curtain of his counting-house window, and, being too late to see his customer, he fell to examining his vehicle, by which, not less than the man, he calculated the quality, and weighed in his mind the necessity of personal attendance. After a careful survey he returned from the window laid down the pen he had been writing with, saying the while to himself, "Plain-certainly plain; but it has the air about it."-And, repeating this observation, the passed into the shop, where his customer, a good looking man, but extremely staid ad delicate for a sea captain, was awaiting him; but this delicacy became quite natural as the result of recent injuries and consequent ill-health, from which he was evidently still suffering, as his right arm was in a sling. "Good morning, sir," said the bland radesman; "pray be seated. What can I

"Indeed, sir, I am sure sir they ! did me great honor; but we do please, sir-

said the captain-for such he appeared to be-seating himself. "External injuries," said the obsequious Douglas, bowing, while he examined the rather surprised at the interest taken in his wounds.

"Indeed, we might say the vital chord is severed. "Not quite so bad as that, I hope!" was the response, accompanied by a feeble smile. "Quite, sir, I assure you, quite. We can get no motion-none whatever." And he gave the watch a twist.

"Ob, the watch-ah, to be sure," said the relieved but much mistaken captain. "Yes, allow me to hope your injuries are not of so serious a nature. This shall be attended to during the week, sir. And now, may I make bold to inquire who of my friends were kind enough to say a good word for me? Lyons? Dundas?" "Well, yes, certainly they were present; but it was Captain Bery more particularly." "Ah, my friend Captain Berry. Is he still of the 'Achilles,' and has he escaped unhurt?" said the shopkeeper, whom the reader will perceive to have a becoming

"It is, indeed, elegant!" said he, changing his posi--"rerv."

"Can you give me the invoice of my purchase?" asked the captain, not liking the fulsome compliment. "Directly, sir," said the jeweler, and, conducting his customer to a private room behind the shop, he went to give the necessary orders. Meanwhile the naval Douglas helped himself to sherry from a decanter on the table, and taking up the newspaper folled back on the ottoman comfortably. "Would you like them to go to-night?" asked the silversmith, presenting the bill. "I think not: they will be safer here till we go down to Derby, which will be very shortly, for London doesn't agree with me. In the meantime a friend, who is absent in the north, has placed his establishment at my disposal," said the captain, taking up the bill, and then continuing, "one thousand two hundred and fifty. you dictate?" Thus he dictated, while the unsuspecting "wide-awake" Douglas wrote:

send me one thousand pounds by bearer, who has the key. Yours, "D. Douglas." And then taking out a bunch of keys he selected one, and dispatched the servant, bidding him to drive quickly, and lose no time in returning to him there. The two Douglases then returned, and talked and drank a bottle of wine very amicably to-
