Written for the Columbia Spy. PEN WAIF-No. 2. THE LOVE OF COUNTRY.

BY JAMES S. WATKINS.

How incomprehensible is the love of country interwoven with our natures, and what a power does it exercise over our hearts! Ifone! It is the exile's hope, though he dwell in lands gorgeous as the fabled East! It is the weary traveller's guiding star; the goal to which the mariner speeds o'er the bounding wave his dashing prow.

dashing prow.

"This royal Thiong of Kings, this scepter'd lele,
This Earth of Majesty, this sent of Mars,
This farth of Majesty, this sent of Mars,
This other Eden, demi-paradise;
This fortees, built by Nature for herself,
Against infection and the hand of war;
This happy breed of ripen, this little world;
This precious stone set in the silver sea,
Which serves it in the office of a wall,
Or as a most defensive to a house,
Against the envy of less happier land;
This blessed plot, this Earth, this Realm, this England
Doer for her reputation through the world."

No one can fail to detects a love of country.

No one can fail to detecta love of country in the above lines of Shakespeare; they are pregnant with true loval ardor, and unswerving fidelity. Such was the love of Shakespeare for his native place—the merry old England. With Americans, too, the love of country has always been first in their hearts, and Liberty, their watchword-

"The love of Liberty with life is given. And life itself the inferior gift of Heaven." I once resided in a house with an elderly English Lady, "a half French, botter half English woman," as Julia says-whose amor patrice, a childhood passed in la belle France, and a forty or fifty years' residence in America, has not in the least degree diminished, and with whose Saint-Georgeand-the-Dragon notions I was inclined to quarrel more than a dozen times a day, white she, I believe, looked upon my inde-pendent ideas—my disregard of rank, and refusal to bow to any save aristocracy of mind-with utter astonishment. Boasting a decent from the nobility of England, and on the maternal side, even from royalty itself, reared in the very precincts of the Queen, still remembering the land of her birth, and abhorring everything un-English as foreign, she, it is said, from infancy, looked upon that 'gilded toy, a King,' and upon the pomps and vanities attendant on that state, with almost religious reverence; the greater, perhaps, from the recollection that on coming to the "land of liberty," she was led by the republican arguments of love, to cast off the bonds of maternal restraint, and the rank slip did inherit, and to a lowly fortune link her high estate; that estate to which, like the saline wife of the patriarch, she is ever looking longingly back. In our frequent conversations, my reasonings, I am convinced, seemed to her a savor of that revolution, of whose horrors she professed to retain a vivid remembrance. She admired the American Republic, but loved merry old England, the home of her youth.

Battimore, Md. 1864. A SKEDADDLER from Uncle Sam's territory fell in love with a Canadian damsel, and vice versa. The parties wished to be murried forthwith, but a difficulty arose. A license costs six dollars-the parties didn't like that. They might be published in a church; but they could not wait three weeks. A Justice of the Peace in Detroit could soon marry them-but skedaddlers dare not go to American soil for fear of capture, and the parties were perplexed,-A happy thought soon presented itself, and was immediately put into execution. A boat was procured, and helping friends crossed the river forun American Justice of the Peace. The bride and bridegroom took boat from this side, and were met by the Justice in the river; and when satisfied they were in American waters, the happy pair were macried according to the laws of Michigan, and under the guns of Fort Wayne. As soon as the ceremonywas con-cluded, no time was lost, but the boat was swiftly pulled to the Canadian shore, where the parties were safely landed to receive the congratulations of several friends who had come down to the beach to witness the interesting scene. - Essex Journal.
