For the Spy. WOMAN'S LOT.

BY TINLEY JOHNSON. I saw her in life's early morn, With spirits light as air ; With heart all free from worldly ills, And thoughts of earthly erre, She then did bask in snony smiles Of hope's bright opening day : And flowers with their pertune sweet, Were strewed upon her way.

I saw her--vears had passed away, Yet still be heart was hyle ; The hand of sorrow had not plunged Her sont in darksome night ; 'Tis true some farrows could be traced Upon her lofty brow : But yet the self-same smile of old No brighter was than now.

I say her-time had onward flew, The self-same suide was there, But deeply planted on her brow Were sorrow, grief and care: The smile still played around her lips But not so bright as when I first beheld her centle form Amoug the haunts of men

And once arain I saw her form, But it was on a bier ; And mourning friends word shedding around Affection's falling tear ; They laid her in the cold, cold grave, Beneath the silent sod . We turned to seek the joy : of life, But she -- to seek her God!
