It is solf-purifying, and no other article of food will impart its fin-vor to another. This is done by the mois-ture—(which carry the impurities) being condensed in the cold corrugated ice box and passed off through the waste pipe, leav-ing the provision chamber dry and sweet, and avoiding the necessity of passing cur-rents of air through the refrigerator, which wastes the ice, introduces moisture, and lessens the temperature of the provision chambers. The ice receiver being in the centre and at the top, divides and forms two separate apartments. The ice, as it melts, passes through a filter and falls into the lower angle where it is retained for its cooling properties, or may be used for drinking purposes.
