SHADY SIDE, NO. 20. BY LOCAL. The description of the poet, In communion with the muses, When he pen'd the sacred verses, Verses, sung by many christians. Christians, taught by revelation; When he speaks of its description, And the place of its location Throws a mystery around it. He describes it as a city, As a great and spacious city, By its massive walls protected, Gates of pearl as white as crystal, ?

And with massive golden pavements, Where the angels sing their praises, Unto God, who has redemed them, Day and night without cession; Tis the song of humble christians Of enlightened humble christians 'Tis the song, they sing of Heaven. Adds encha timent to the story, Adds enchantment by the distance
Time and space annihilated, In a single line he's pen'd it: He has fixed for the location, The location of his Heaven, Heaven for disembodied spirits, And their dwelling place in future,

On a place, beyond all place, And where time's too short to reach it On a place, "beyond the bounds of Time and space," which are eternal; Two absurdities together,
As no bounds known to either. Go i, by his decree, eternal, Has from mortals, hid the future ; 'Tis his plan, his will, unaltered,' Leaves them all'in common biiddnes Common blindness of the future, Each one forms his own opinion, Own opinion of the future, Own opinion of a Heaven, Of a Heav'n he'd like to dwell in.

Such, as would best suit his notion, Such, as would best suit her wishes, And would gratify his passions Theologians, case and comfort, Heathen, a good place for hunting; But professors, who are worldly, Would prefer a golden city. Could we trace each generation, Trace each generation backwards, Trace each backwards, till we come to Eve and Adam in the garden;

We could never find two persons, Just alike in mind and body: We should find each one, possessed of Certain traits, and certain notions, Notions of his own, peculiar, Of the present and the future, And each person, quite tenacious, Sanguine in her own opinion, Of the duties of a christian.
