BY CAPT. W. W. RICHMOND. Come, love, come, the stars Hang bright above, Like glittering lanterns hung To light the path of love, The moon sits on her throne Clothed in her silver lace, The trees nod in the breeze

Come, love, come, the air Of murmuring waters As they glide along Through the gardens, bright With fragrant flowers,

Let us release ourselve From this world's cold alar And saunter out beneath The moon and twinkling stars

Oh no, the idea would be too ridiculous, but do they not daily do that which is equally ridiculous? If the pupil is reading in an unknown tongue it certainly can make no difference to him whether that unknown tongue be Greek, Batin or English, and the fact of his being acquainted with some of the words in his reading exercise is no more qualification for the correct reading of them all than the knowledge of a few Greek Sophocles. Now is this fact borne in where, state that when I use the phrase ing throughout the country; although I can state that I do know of one county Ninety per cent. of the Teachers in that county were in the regular, daily habit permitted-much less, required-a pupil to read a passage which he did not thormore discreditable to distrust our friends animal economy.
