last the pavements and streets were in a bad condition. It was not safe to move along taster than a snail. The youngsters were in their glory, and Locust street was crowded with them and their "jumpers." Skating on the river, for the nonce, was discarded, and the streets and pavements were made to do duty. Old folks remained housed and it was amusing to watch those who were compelled to be out, making zig-zag strides to keep upright. We perceived several lying on the pavements, fceling for the soft side of the brick. Taken
