One morning in April I received some captured letters and orders, and some copies of reports of scouts and rebel deserters, and was directed to find General Grant and deliver them to him. After riding several hours, I found him between our lines during one of the front and rear attacks which the enemy made upon our left, and near the Dinwiddie Court House. This rear attack produced not a little confusion in our troops. Here and there was hurrying to and fro, riding in hot baste, giving and changing orders, taking new positions, or changing front. As yet the firing was desultory; a few had been killed, and several wounded. General Grant, accompanied with one staffofficer and an orderly or two, was assisting the division and brigade commanders in the suitable disposition of their forces, he having come upon that part of our line soon after these simultaneous attacks were made.

While engaged in these arrangments, three soldiers passed near the General, carrying a dead man, wrapped in a blanket, from the skirmish line. Grant rode up to them, and ordering them to stop, said: "Whom have you there?"
One of them replied: "We have the body of our captain. We are taking it to the rear. He was just now killed on the skirmish line." They were young men, rather tall, and fine looking, and appeared from eighteen to twenty-four years of age. You remember, my brave boys," says the General, "that the first duty of a soldier in the hour of battle, is to secure the victory; that acquired, there will be sufficient time to care for the wounded, collect the captured property, and bury the dend."

"We know that, General," said the eldest, glancing at the stars of the Lieutenant-General; "but he was our father, too. When we set out for the war we all promised our the survivors would send home to be buried on the banks of the Kalamazoo." "It can make but little difference to your brave father where his body lies," said Grant, "while the more than Spartan patriotism and self-denial of your mother and sister will not permit you to leave the post mother and sister that whoever should die of duty in an hour like this." They nodded assent, but were too deeply affected to reply. They laid the body of their father at the roots of a pine tree which stood near by, and half running, half walking, returned to their regiment. Tears glistened in the eyes of their commanding General as he remarked their carnest though sorrowful resignation, and he often turned to catch a glimpse of them as they sank in the little valleys and rose on the hills hurrying back.

Within less than two hours the battle for the day was won. The three brothers came out unhurt; the body of their father was embalmed at City Point, and sent to Parma, Michigan.

A little more than a month afterward, when that part of the army passed Rich-mond, the two youngest brothers were the junior officers in their father's company, and the elder was the adjutant of their reg-

THE UNIVERSAL RULE OF CONDUCT.-We should behave ourselves at all times towards others, the same as we would wish their conduct to be towards ourselves. He who sincerely and truly measures others by himself, obeys that law naturally imprinted in his bosom, which dictates to him, not to do to others what he would not they should do to him; and whatsoever things he would that men should do to him, to do even the same to them. Is there any one maxim, by which a man may regulate his whole life? It is simply to act towards others as we would desire they should act towards us; we need but this rule alone; it is the foundation and principle of all our duties. Let us, then, regard our neighbor as ourselves; let us use the same standard, in judging ourselves, as that by which we judge others, and estimate their sufferings and enjoyments according to our own; so shall we fulfil the law of true charity.
