Gone at Last. The old National Intelligencer, after a painful and lingering illness, in the sixtyninth year of its age. It was founded with the city of Washington in the year 1800, under the auspices of the Jeffersonian republican party and Jefferson's administration, by Gales and Seaton, and published by them jointly for over forty years, and by Seaton, the surviving partner, for some ten or fifteen years longer. At his death a former clerk of the establishment, Mr. Coyle, with several associates, financial and editorial, took the paper in hand; but it had long before fallen into a decline, from which all efforts to resuscitate i were useless. In August, 1814, with the occupation of Washington by the British army, after the battle of Bladensburg, the Intelligencer office was honored with a sacking by a detachment of the British troops. That was the making of the paper. From that day it began a new and prosperous career. It went on, sailing smoothly with the wind, through the administration of Madison and Monroe; but with the break-up of the old Republican party in 1824 it took a new departure in adhering to the fortunes of Henry Clay.

From this diversion it became the central national organ and oracle of the old Whig party, a trenchant party leader on the hank question, the tariff, internal improvements, &c., fighting Jackson and his henchmen and his democratic successors with marked ability down to the dissolution of the Whig party in 1852. Then, thrown adrift upon the waves, it began to fail. Nay, it began to fail with the establishment of the independent newspaper press; but its mission ended with the Whig Through all this period, exceeding a half a century, the Intelligencer was the recipient of millions of public money, under the old system of a party dispensation of the government printing from both houses of Congress and the Executive Departments. The paper had a large subecription list throughout the United States; but under the old credit system it had, as we have been told, upon its books at one time nearly half a million of unpaid subscriptions for papers served, and probably not one-fifth of this outstanding sum was ever collected. The profits of the establishment were from the government sops and subsidies so liberally lavished upon it as a party organ. From these subsidies Gales and Seaton received a mint of money; but in their free and generous style of living and thoughtless wastefulness they contrived to spend it all as fast as it came in, and to be in debt besides all the time. This was the inheritance of Mr. Coyle and Company, but under the benign administration of Andy Johnson, with its sops and subsidies, they still kept the paper afloat after the old fashion. From the general of these sons and subsidies, they still kept the paper afloat after the old fashion. From the general of these sons and subsidies, they are also subsidies, and they are also subsidies, under the new administration, the paper has died. It was in its day, under Galesand Seaton, a model newspaper dignity and decorum, even in the most exciting and embittered party contests; but the moral which it teaches is that of a highly respectable, generous and reckless spend-
