MAO The Dull Scholar a Z O

" Will you go out and take a walk with me, - Edmund ! said a pleasant force Tewas the hoar of intermission, at noon. The other boys were out in the playgrounds, improving the time plone, in one corner of the schoolroom, with his head, leaning upon his band, and his open book lying on the desk before him. His eyes were fixed, with a rad, almost despairing expression upon the rage; but he was not studying He had no courage to study. He was thinking how easy it seemed for the rest to learn, and how hard it was for Lim ; and, he was almost inclined to give up, and never try to learn any thing again. He started, and looked up, as Walter's roice fell upon his ear. Then heisbook his head, and bent over his book again, with a burning glow on his cheek, and a tear in his eye. "Yes, co go," urged Walter, "I want you. Take your bask and slate with you," he alled is a whisper, "and I will show you alout the lesson."

An expression of surprise, followed by a stiden gleam of hope, rassed over Elmund's face. Tive minutes after. the best and the Juliest scholar in school were scaled and a rock, in the shelter of a little grove, but camestly engaged, the one in explaining, the other in endearoileg to enderstand the simple straight forward explanation, such as onegelilid will gire zugiher-an explanation sometimes for more effectual timo one given by an experienced teacher. "Do you understand it now?" said Waher enziously. "I think so," Edmund replied; "but I'm not sure."

"Explain it to me," said Walter, CLOTHING DEPOTS "just as if I knew nothing about it, and in Allegany county. Hundreds of costomyou were teaching me."

Elmund commenced, went ha'l way through the example, and stopped short. "I can't explain it," he said despondingly.

"But you went straight half way through," Walter answered, encouragingly. "Now I'll explain the rest, and you listen ; and then you can explain it." explanation a second time; and then articles, viz.: Edmund tried again. His s cond ef-fort was successful. "Now try the next," said Walter. The next was tried, and performed, and explained; and the next, and so on, through the whole lesson. Edmund's face beamed with happiness at the close. . I understand the lesson now," he said. "Oh, lam so glad! Only yesterday Mr. Merton told me if I did not do better I mast go into a lower class; and I dreaded it so much! And Ally will be so glad too!" he added. "I thank you very much for helping me."

"I will help you again, to morrow, if said : to-morrow, and every day, as long as you need help."

That afternoon, Edmund took his usual place in his class with a new feel-The fear of failure-enough, in i self, to make failure almost certain the dread of ridicule, were gone. The other boys wondered, as they saw the example given him correctly performed, and heard a clear, simple explanation of the process, given without hesitation and without embarressment. If he had looked at Walter, just then, he For the contemplated Canal from Wells- THE undersigned having been entrustwould have seen a very happy, smiling would have seen a very happy, smiling sile to Rochester; and hoping that the face; quite as happy as Edmund's, Plank Road will be continued on to Conthough the pleasure expressed there was of a different kind.

That night, little Alice Watson lingered, after school was dismissed, by her teacher's desk. Mr. Merton was busily arranging books and papers, before locking the desk for the night. He did not notice the little girl for some time. But at last, as he turned the key In the lock, he said kindly, "Did you want any thing Ally?"

Alice laid one little hand timidly on her teacher's knee. "Edmund won't have to go into a lower class in Arithmetic, will he?" she said.

"Not if he has so good a lesson every day as he has to day." Mr. Merton replied. "Does your brother try to learn, Alice?"

... O yes sir! indeed he does!" Alice exclaimed.

"Then why is he so backward? said Mr. Merton. "The can hardly read as well as you, now, Ally; and in Arithmetic, especially, he has done nothing, till to-day, but make blunders?" Alice's cheek flushed as she an swered: "Edmund has been sick a great deal, sir. He has never been to school much till lately. All his lessons are hard for him; but Arithmetic, is harder than any of the rest. Father's away from home, and mother has no time to help him; and I don't know enough, yet, to help him in that. .. "Very well;" said Mr. Merton kindly, tell him to keep trying, and I will try to shelp him."

Edmund did keep trying. For a few days, Walter went over the lessons with him, explaining everything that seemed difficult. Then Edmund chose to go on by himself, calling on Walter for assistance, when he found anything that he could not conquer alone... Before the close of the elerni," the two boys stood side by side in the class. One was very grateful; both were very happy.

"I hope you never will?" said their mother. "It is much beiter to help others, than to laugh at them. A little encouragement and a little help have done a great tleal for Edmund. They would do a great deal for others, many light merri'v ; but Edmund was sitting times, though all would not profit by them as he has done. We never know how much harm may be done by a thoughtless laugh or an unfeeling sneer. We cannot be 100 careful not to injure the feelings; of others; and we need never be afraid of doing too much to make them happy. I am very glad you assisted Edmund; and I hope you will always try to help those who need help; not only in school, but all the way through life."

"I certainly will try to do so, mother," was Walters reply, Co No
