However we may differ on the merits of the prohibitory liquor law, we agree that intemperance, the, herrors of which we are called upon to witness daily, is an appalling evil. In the city we behold life in all its intensity; and here, consequently, the -Phil. North American. evil is seen in its most terrible forms. We see taverns and grog-shops mul-tiplied in every block of our city. The signs which point the road to ruin are almost as numerous as awning posts along our streets. At any hour of the day we may select, we cannot walk a square without meeting an individual in whose glaring eyes and staggering steps the effects of rum may be seen. Men and women, and mere boys and girls, are frequently seen reeling in drunkenness. And this is only the view of the surface. Go deeper, and you will find hundreds unsealed ands of Fox Estate, known as los of homes rendered desolate. You will behold the laboring man spending the greater portion of his hardlyearned wages for the fiery poison, while his wife stitches from morning go. and M. Mat.ison. till night, in- a comfortless hovel, to keep her children from starvation; or the sober workman going home, wearied by toil, to find his children in the streets, and his wife lying beastly drank upon the floor. You will see young men of brilliant parts-the hopes of their relatives and friendbuining away their brains, wasting bat surely into an early grave. You will find sections of the city in which not a night passes without an exhibisomething more than imagination to
