THE LOVE CURE-A SERTCH FROM LIFE.

EY OUR FAMILY PHYSICIAN.

1 had already had some skill and motorety in my treatment of pulmonary complaints, and traveling north one Summer for health and rest, Listopped for a few weeks at a beautiful little village near the St. Lawrence, where I was somewhat known.

I liad only been in the village two days when I was called in to see the voung daughter of a wealthy farmer by the name of Summer.

Ida Summer had been the belle of the county, and though only seventeen. her marvellous beauty had already kindled a quenchless fire in the hearts of many an unsuccessful suiter in her favor. Frank, confiding and at once playful and modest, arch, yet, innocent, full of wild spirits, yet utterly devoid of coquetry-to see her was to love her.

I found the peerless girl, whom I had remembered from the summer before as buoyant and rosy as health, pale and wan as a summer cloud, and apparently in the closing stages of a decline.

A careful investigation into the state of her lungs convinced me that hers was a mental rather than a phyiscal consumption. 1 studied her case, carefully watched the various expressions of her speaking face, and at last came to the conclusion that her malady was one purely of heart.

Of unrequited affection ? I could not think that-beautiful and good as sho; was. The case was a difficult one, Tenderly and gently I probed every sounding, but could arrive at no conclusion. Thus much I discovered -that she possessed no particular regard for any one of the youths far or pear, whose name I could get hold of. And notwithstanding all my efforts she seemed vapidly declining.

I made minute inquiry into all her past life of her mother, but so cautiously as not to let my motive be apparent. I learned that she had spent a few weeks of the winter preceding with an intimate friend in an adjoining town, and from that time had begun to fade.

To that town I repaired; but by closest inquiry of one or two friends in that place could ascertain no clue to her illness. To all the swains alike she had been friendly, but nothing more.

The elegyman of the church which she had attended-and she had been exceedingly regular and devoted in her attendance--was a young man, but one much given to study and seclusion, and one who refused to mingle in any manner in social gatherings. She had consequnctly seen nothing of him, except while he was officiating in his pulpit.

I had made a pretext to call on him, and found him a man altogether made after the model of what might be the highest aspirations of a true woman's blush and statt of joy and modesty. What then and there transpired, no one but the great searcher of hearts, and the two of his choicest hanhiwork thus brought together-a dying girl and a minister of heaven-can answer. I left them alone as long as I thought her weak state might bear, and when I opened the door, I found him sitting

I led him to her chamber, saw her beside her bed, her slender hand fast locked in his, and his soul-beaming eyes pouring life and love upon her. My eyes filled with tears as I caught a sight of her radiant face, so full of peace and service bliss and life, but he tears I shed were tears of joy.

My patient, with almost one bound, regained her health and strongth, and the glorious representative of God's minister upon earth, changing his mind upon the subject of matrimony in favor of the "right one," is now one of the few truly happy men on earth, happy in a life marriage with one every way congenial with him, and every way worthy of him.
