TOO MUCH LAND. Mr. IREDELL. I noticed an article, long since, in one of the Agricultural publications of the North, hended "Too much land." The object of the writer was to deinonstrate that farmers, as a general thing were in the habit of attempting the cultivation of far more land then they had the means of cultivating well. I am convinccd, for one, of the entire defensibility and correctness of this position. There is a sort of morbid ambition on the part of farm or of this position. There is a more approved styles. As they are both EXPERIENCED work they are both experienced that they can give socrate and the correctness of this position. crs, to own large farms, or rather tracts of land, (for we cannot apply the term farm to a section of several hundred acres, no large full land the section of several hundred acres, no large full land the section of several hundred acres, no large full land the section of several hundred acres, no large full land the section of several hundred acres, no large full large f part of which is efficiently fenced, and not one acre of which produces enough to remunerate the owner for the expense of carrying it on,) and to be considered large ouners, rather than to deserve the epithet of good farmers. I know of no condition or situation in life more truly pitiable than that of an extensive farmer who is pinched for means; who has lands he cannot fence, buildings he cannot repair, and debt which he dose not possess the means to pay!-And this, too often, is found to be the condition of those culivators, who, from an inordinate ambition are desirous of excelling in the extent of their possessions, and who too generally realize the fate of the TED, STEWED, FRITTERED, ORECOLLOPED. him to emulate the size and majestic circumference of an ox, and to rest the success of his rivalry upon the emptiness of wind.

. "A little farm well tilled, and a little house well filled' is the fundamental principle in the creed of the intelligent farmer. Concentrated efforts in farming, are capable of effecting astonishing results, and to be convinced of this one need only contemplate the effects produced by gardening, where more manure and grater care are accorded, and where, also we expect to see better results. In the vicinity of Boston—where market gardening is carried on to a very large extent, I am crodibly informed that manure to the value of $100 is frequently applied to an acre, and that from that acre, the nett returns in cash over and above all expenses, frequently exceeds $1,000. The profits of British agriculture are also capable of being addressed in testification of the advantages of liberal manuring. Many of our farmers would think thomselves utterly ruined were, they to expend, upon their whole farms, as much for manure, as many Received the sections of the profits of the section of the farmed and antitation of the advantages of liberal manuring. Many of our farmers would think thomselves utterly ruined were, they to expend, upon their whole farms, as much for manure, as many Received the section of the profits of the section of the sectio are accorded, and where, also, we expect farms, as much for manure, as many English farmers expend in manuring a single acro. Restricting our efforts, however, in this particular, is poor economy. our investments with a liberal interest, but and rarely accords more than this, even to the most favored. H. D. WHITE.
