CORN—LATE vs EARLY PLANTING.

MR. EDITOR, I promised some time ago to send you an article on raising Corn, and in accordance with that promise have hastily penned the following, which is at your service.

For the last six years I have been experimenting, for the purpose of ascertaining the best mode of growing corn. One great error into which our farmers fall, is that of planting too close; from three feet to three feet six inches being the distance usually allowed between the rows each way. My plan is to score the rows from north to south, leaving a space of full four feet between each. I then drop two grains at one place, with an interval of two feet and a half betwen each dropping. My object in scoring out north and south is to give every hill or stalk the benefit of as much sun as possible, and prevent in a certain degree one row from shading another. Corn, like snakes, is fond of the sun. Every hill is covered with the hoe, (preferring the good old way in that respect to any other) taking good care that no stones or clods rest upon the place where the corn has been planted. This can be accomplished in no way so well as by the hoe.

My time for planting is generally between the 10th and 15th of May, giving the ground a chance to become well warmed before the seed is put into it. There is far less danger of corn rotting when the ground is warm, and the rapidity of its growth more than compensates for the lateness of the season; besides it is not near so liable to a back set as when it is planted earlier. Many farmers plant their corn the last week in April, when the ground is wet and cold, and as a consequence, (unless under very favorable circumstances) it lays there for weeks without germinating, and very frequently rots. I have known corn to remain in the ground for three weeks before it made its appearance above ground, while it is seldom that corn planted from the 10th to the 15th of May, does not sprout in three or four days. It may be proper to remark here, that I always soak my seed corn in hen manure water before planting.

I prefer my mode of planting to the drilling system, as the corn is less difficult to keep clean, and I find that I can raise just as much as by the other plan. I have raised from 75 to 80 bushels per acre, without extra manuring, which I consider a fair yield.

Last season, I tried an experiment upon ten acres, planting one half full four feet apart, two grains at a place, 2½ feet apart. The other half was drilled in, 4 feet apart. The drilled portion was much more difficult to keep clean than the other, and the yield was about the same. The corn on the 5 acres planted according to my favorite method, that is full four feet between the rows and two and a half feet between the droppings, was much the finest, being larger and fuller in the ear, and easier husked.

I should have mentioned in the beginning of this article, that my ground intended for corn, is always put in the very best condition before planting. Spring plowing is, I think, much to be preferred for corn unless the land is too rich, which is not often the case. In concluding this plain statement I will merely remark, that if the same attention were paid to corn growing that is given to the raising of wheat—if the land was as well manured and worked, we could as easily raise one hundred bushels to the acre, as we now raise fifty.

SEED POTATOES.

I noticed a communication from "B.," of Dennisville, N. J., in relation to small potatoes for seed. He has very wisely come to the conclusion that small ones are better than large ones, just because his large potatoes did not produce well after he had cut them all to pieces; that is no way to serve potatoes or anything else, "B.'s" experience is, that they do no come up well, even after being cut so small; they hardly had sbstance enought left to sprout. If "B." will try large potatoes, without cutting, and plant one in a hill, he will never cut his seed potatoes, or plant small ones. My plan is to plough deep, as early as possible; cross the ground deep; manure heavily with straw, partly rotted, (stable-manure is not good,) and almost invariably I have good potatoes. It will not do for farmers to pick small seed of any kind. If they do, as they sow, so shall they reap; and as for little potatoes, being of little or no value, it is a mistake. They are as valuable for seed as anything that is raised for horses, hogs or cows.—Dollar.
