

(Written for the Clearfield Republican.)

Diphtheria.

As pseudo-membranous sore throat is a subject which has recently alarmed our community, as well as many others, and engaged the attention of many of our best physicians, I desire, with your leave, to make a few suggestions concerning it, and give you such reflections regarding its nature and progress as I have been able to gather, through the kindness of physicians in those communities where the disease appeared most fatal, as well as a few well marked cases which came under my immediate observation.

The nearest point to this town where the disease prevailed to an alarming extent, is in Jefferson county, about nine miles from here, on an elevated situation, in the family of Mr. Price, of Winslow township, and in a remarkably healthy place. In this family, five died in a few months, leaving only a single member of the family—a boy about fifteen years old; the disease proving fatal in every instance when attacked, in periods of from five to twenty-eight days; their ages varying respectively from five to twenty-one years. The fact that the disease confined itself so fatally to this one place, proves most certainly that some local cause connected with this place was conducive to the disease.

In this disease, (like other zymotic diseases, the etiology of which is usually uncertain,) it is with the utmost difficulty that we can determine how far it could be justly attributed to meteorological, miasmatic, or other causes. I learn, however, that most persons, embracing every age and sex, residing in the locality where the epidemic first made its appearance, has, at different times during its prevalence, symptoms of the disease more or less distinctly marked; but those who were exposed severally, and attacked, in removing to another locality, suffered only a modified and mitigated form of it; in this respect agreeing with the general law of epidemics. Of the contagiousness of the disease, I have not a doubt. In those cases which I have seen, and those reported to me at my request, which I think must have been apparent to every one possessed of a discriminating mind, who had an opportunity presented him of witnessing its peculiar character, tendency, and progress. In those families where more than one member was attacked, those last seized invariably ran the most violent and rapid course, terminating, in some instances, in four or five days; doubtless owing to the fact that those last attacked were exposed, not only to the original source of the contagion, but at the same time to the peculiar poison given off from those who were already suffering from the disease. In most cases, a period of two weeks elapsed between an exposure to the disease and its invasion; the period of incubation, however, varied from five to twenty days.

The anatomical lesions were principally those of the lymphatic glands. This was more especially the case with the cervical glands, which, in the most malignant cases, were very much enlarged, so as to interfere with deglutition, and alarmingly obstruct the air passages.

The primary symptoms of this frightful disease, apparent in my observation, was pain in the ear. This was not only pathognomonic, but prominent, and almost if not invariably present; in every case that I have seen, and those with whom I have conversed, who have recovered, all remember this symptom, for a few days prior to the patient's making the least complaint, in any other form whatever, and before the smallest speck or coagulation of lymphatic exudation could be discovered on the tonsils or elsewhere. To this symptom we must now add stiffness of the muscles of the neck, great prostration, nervous system greatly depressed, slight throats, the action of the glands increased, sore throat, tongue slightly coated in the centre and red around the outside, orthopnea, occasionally prematurely slow pulse, but generally accelerated and feeble. On examining the fauces, the tonsils were found to be red, enlarged, and inflamed, and soon small points of lymphatic exudation were discovered on them which spread rapidly over the contiguous parts, until it entirely covered the nuygdala, uvula, soft palate, and the entire surface of the pharynx with a pseudo-membrane, which continued to extend upwards, until it closed the nasal fossa, and downwards as far as to invade the larynx, where its progress was indicated by hoarse coughing, aphonia, and orthopnea, which terminated soon in secondary croup.

In most cases the appetite and digestion were unimpaired; and, although I have the report of a very intelligent physician in Jefferson county of a case where typhoid fever was added or ensued, there was no mental disturbance observable during any stage of the disease.

In a few cases petechiæ were discovered scattered over the body and arms in the advanced period of the disease. The symptom was not frequently met with, nor was it found dependent on any peculiar debility or malignancy of the case. In one case, to which my attention was called by a friend to observe this eruption, I could not characterize it as true petechiæ, notwithstanding my friend, who is a very intelligent man and tried physician, so regarded it.

Dysphagia was, of course, a common and distressing symptom, in consequence of the organs of deglutition being, in very severe cases, extensively involved.

In one case, the obstruction of the oesophagus was complete, and the patient, (the last one that died in the family of Mr. Price,) after surviving the primary stage, and after giving, in all other respects, a good hope of recovery, sunk for want of nourishment, and died of pure exhaustion. This patient refused all medical aid after the primary stage had passed.

In the course of treatment that was pursued, it is needless to say that, in a disease characterized as this one was by such complete atony, in every stage, no depletory measures were resorted to, with the exception, I believe, of occasionally an emetic or mild laxative in such cases where an evacuation of the prime viæ was plainly called for.

External revulsives, the topical application of alum and nitrate of silver to the morbid surface of the throat, tannic acid, chloride of soda, and numerous other astringent gargles, were prescribed and emphatically used, but with, I regret, very unsatisfactory results. Muric acid and tincture of myrrh, in equal parts, applied with a sponge to the fauces, I found detached the pseudo-membrane more easily, and diminished the liability of its being renewed more effectually than anything else employed for that purpose. But the most valuable of all topical applications that I have found, and which in the cases which came under my immediate observation, afforded in almost every instance decided relief—its active astringent property made a peculiarly appropriate and well adapted to obtain the relaxed and unobscured condition which attends the advanced stage of the disease—

- R. Potass chlorid, ʒ drachmas.
Mellita
Tinct. myrrh, s. s. ʒ ss.
Aqua, ʒ ss.
M. F. gargle.

These portions are intended for an adult. I will here remark, however, that in my immediate practice, I did not encounter any of those malignant cases reported from other localities.

I have had no opportunity of looking into the morbid appearances of any of these cases, and consequently cannot say whether the disease of the heart alluded to by writers is actually present, save the changed condition of the fibrine of the blood, so characteristic of this disease, and which doubtless gives rise to diseased conditions of the cavities of the heart, found in post mortem inspection.

The liberal use of stimulants, particularly brandy and whiskey, usually produced free diaphoresis, which gives great relief to the patient, not only from the general depression of the nervous system, but at the same time from the most powerful local affection.

Sulphate of quinine and alcoholic stimulants, freely administered in doses sufficient to produce its peculiar effects on the brain, will, I am confident, do much good, if not entirely cure some cases.

If the patient gets well, convalescence will be slow, and it may be necessary to continue the use of stimulants and tonics during most of the time which ensues before the natural functions of the system will be fully restored.

This is not a new disease; for one in all respects similar to it was epidemic at Tours, in 1818, 1819, 1820, and 1821, and received the name of Diphtheritis from M. Bretonneau.

That "Strange Affair"—Again.

SAIR LINK, Pa., Dec. 31, 1860.
MERRILL, EDITOR: You will favor your correspondent, A., by publishing the following communication in the Republican.

The editorial in the Republican of December 5th, to which your correspondent A., in his last communication, then only alluded, requires of him, at this time, to notice further and more particularly.

We are indeed sorry to say, the editor of the Journal, in that editorial, expresses himself towards your correspondent A., in words and manner disrespectful and offensive. No correct writer will be innocent in moral sentiment, and indulge in such feelings; and if our public journals have not more regard for propriety in their publications, the morals of society are not only endangered, but they will be eventually destroyed.

What has your correspondent A. done, by his communication to the "Republican," that he has aroused the Journal editor's worse passions, received a torrent of abuse, and had his character assailed? Is it because one man in Kurthens township had the moral independence, in doing justice to a stranger, of whom at that time he knew nothing, to simply reiterate the facts, viz: that a stranger had appeared at Kurthens; asked entertainment for the night; respectable in appearance, genteel in deportment, accomplished in manner, intelligent in mind—thereby indicating education, propriety, and respect; an accident occurring; delay in consequence; value of property; leaving the same; and his departure?

Now, let us see what the Journal editor says, and in what way he asperses the character of your correspondent A. And first, in his editorial, he introduces his informer, and very politely names him "Mr. Moore himself," then says, from him he received the information concerning the horse, but don't gratify us to say from whom he received the information, that the stranger was "very reticent." He then compares the statement of "Mr. Moore himself," and your correspondent A., and passing over the comparison very satisfactorily, he adds, "what we can see no great difference in the articles set forth in his [A.] communication, and as stated in our item the week previous." Here he comes to a long pause, and so qualifies thus:

My public view of the stranger, to which A. finds fault, is either a property or impropriety. If the stranger be a thief, my propriety of the publication is only obtained at a venture, which, under the circumstances, is not very honorable, but it will do then again, if he be not a thief, it is undoubtedly an impropriety, and a gross one, and somebody likely to suffer. "Mr. Moore himself" can render me no assistance, as my informer, for he will have enough to do to take care of No. 1.

In this honest and only correct view of the case, the Journal editor learns his true situation in the "strange affair." And from his unfortunate situation, he discovers no easy escape; therefore, he is desperate; his mind "very reticent," "blind," "staggered," in his breast a hearing commences; passion bursts; emitts smoke; fire; and red-hot words of aspersions down upon the reproving head of your correspondent, A., to destroy his character of that "strange affair." Next, and last, comes his song of gratification, and, as he enjoys it, of deliverance, which he sings thus:

"A fellow feeling, it is said,
Makes us wondrous kind, indeed"—(sometimes.)

In this, you see, is the clapping of the climax of his aspersions and offensiveness. And it is very much to be regretted, in this particular, that he don't gratify us so much as to give us the name of the composer of his song, but only leaves us to infer that "Mr. Moore himself" is the composer. However, we are happy here to do him the justice to say, that we know Mr. Moore, who himself is so gratefully fond of singing.

The truth is, the Journal editor, seeing the gross impropriety he committed in the manner of the publication, "strange affair," to which your correspondent A.'s communication only found fault; and sensibly feeling the kind rebuke therein contained, has no excuse to offer for doing as unkind, disrespectful, and unjustly as he set towards a stranger, of whom at the time he knew nothing. Hence he is compelled to take hold of anything that presents itself. Like a drowning man, he catches at a straw. It is true, he does not attack the character of your correspondent in a direct and many way; but, smother like, he does it by oblique hints and inferences, in which his meaning can be easily understood.

And now, however successful he may have supposed himself to be in his happy resort, and secure in his fancied retreat, we shall not disturb his gratification thereof, which we could easily do by the mention of a "material fact" applying to the case; and which "sets facts" clearly, and shows conclusively, without a doubt or "peep," that he, the Journal editor himself, has a "fellow feeling" for—which makes him "wondrous kind" with—this time. Mortification is painful under any circumstances, and much so would it be in this case for the unfortunate Journal editor, for he in mentioning that straggler fact, that we will spare him the shameful bludge the mention of the "material fact" would subject him to, and keep he will be gratified with our generosity. However, we suggest this property, in this case, of him maintaining the "material fact," which he can do with but little inconvenience to himself, and inserting the same as a chapter in the sequel to the "strange affair." It would be an important addition; and, indeed, the sequel is not complete without it.

THE CRISIS!

NOW IS THE TIME
When Goods are indeed Sacrificed!!

BUSSMAN & REED.
In basement of Merrill & Bigler's Store, Clearfield, have concluded to clear out their large stock of DRY GOODS, AND BOOTS AND SHOES, at prices really astonishing.

This is probably the BEST CHANCE that will ever be presented to the LADIES OF CLEARFIELD, and the public generally, for supplying themselves with THE CHOICEST ARTICLES, at the very lowest prices—prices, in fact, which are lower than the articles can be made or imported for, and prices which nothing but the unsettled condition of the country has made. Now do these low figures apply to a few leading articles only, but to everything in the line of Dry Goods, Boots and Shoes, JEWELRY—from Dress Goods to Domestic, all are embraced in THIS GREAT SLAUGHTER.

We will not mention any of our Goods nor prices here; all we say is, come early, and examine for yourself.

Each person purchasing Three Dollars worth of Goods will be entitled to a GIFT, worth of 25 cents to $5.

BUSSMAN & REED.
N. B.—We shall not remain any longer than the 21st of January, 1861.
