Order, Marriage and Death. A few days ago an injured husband entered the office of the N. Y. Tribune...

During his dying hours this man received messages of sympathy from distinguished men and women, including married men and Christians.

The press manifested the liveliest interest in his case, and with very few exceptions, spoke tenderly of him, and invoked the remembrance of his law upon his murderer.

To us, the whole case—the seduction, the murder, the sympathy, the nominal marriage—constitute the most disgusting and demoralizing chapter in the annals of social and domestic life.

It needed the force of a pretended marriage solemnized by two ministers, to complete the ghastly drama.

The astounding economy, and the horror of the Christian community, was actually performed, and the guilty bridegroom passed from this capital tragedy to his reckoning with Him who has said, "Thou shalt not commit adultery," as well as, "Thou shalt not kill."

These two commandments govern our views of the right and wrong of this triple crime.

The facts are briefly these, as we gather them from the papers: Richardson, a writer for the press, became intimate with the wife of McFarland...

It is not pretended that McFarland was unfaithful to her; but he had become intemperate and lost his property. A divorce obtained under such circumstances is void and worthless in the eyes of morals and religion.

To marry a woman so divorced is adultery, and in the eyes of the law, a pretended marriage is the crime of bigamy.

McFarland is a murderer in the sight of God's law; as Dan. Sickles is, who was appointed Minister to Spain; and as Cole is, who has just been appointed to office in Washington.

Those men—McFarland, Sickles, and Cole—are all guilty of manslaughter, even in the mildest view of crime, and it would be well for society if they could be held responsible, and punished as murderers.

No possible justification of these crimes can be made. In the case of McFarland there is even less palliation than in the others.

He has been two or three years about it, and a sudden production of crime. It will be hard to make any jury take this view of it, and when they sit in judgment on a man who shoots the seducer of his wife, they will bring in a verdict—served him right.

That has come to be the common, but immoral, sentiment of this country. We hope he will be convicted and punished to the extreme of the law.

And if we are alone in the press of the United States in the opinion, we nevertheless deliberately and definitely proclaim the opinion that of two wicked men, the seducer is more vile than the murderer.
