OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
By what I propose, there would be no end of inflation or contraction. Congress, the demands of trade, not Congress, would regulate the currency. The effect would be to increase the value of greenbacks to that of gold-bearing bonds, and this is the first step in the march towards resumption.

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
The most honest tax, the easiest paid, and the last that ought to be reported is the income tax. If the government would call off its spies and informers from other branches of the revenue service, and put them to watching those who evade payment of the income tax, it would be much better for the revenues. A system of espionage is now practiced in the country, so shameful and oppressive, that it would provoke revolution if attempted under a despotic ruler. Not long ago a poor German here in Erie sold two glasses of lager beer, out of a cask that was not stamped, to a pair of government detectives. They pretended to be lager beer vendors in a neighboring town, and on leaving the brewery showed the boy ten cents, and at once arrested the German. This is the kind of men which is employed on this service. They must serve an apprenticeship as bank thieves before they are qualified for the duty which honest men instinctively shrink from.—The larger beer dealer compromised by paying $700 rather than to go into the United States Court here. The officers would have been complimented for their vigilance and zeal in behalf of the government, and the accused would have been subjected to the heaviest damages. That court should have written on its doors what a post forgone to be inscribed over the portals of hell: "Let him who enters here leave poor behind." Any party that follows up this sort of business must go to the devil. No party can afford to keep in its pay a horde of spies and informers to prey on the people. The people will rebel against it. They are rebelling now.

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
I'm told the cattle bill will come up again next session. That cattle bill is an old bill. It has narrowly missed becoming a law several times. If passed it would take value from every bullock and heifer that grazes in the valleys of Pennsylvania. In Philadelphia every rich man's mutton chop, and every poor man's tripe, would be taxed for the benefit of a monopoly.

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
I want no quarrel with his Excellency. He treated Mr. Brewster's demerit, but he passed. I want no trouble with the Governor. I have trouble enough with the ring. It is true that Geary has joined it, so much the worse. But I will say for him that in his first administration he has led an honest life. His hands never touched a bribe. Reported—How then do you account for the alacrity with which he approved some of the most obnoxious schemes of the ring? Senator Lowery—His undue anxiety to be re-elected led him into many acts which are not defensible. Geary wielded the power of the ring much more than he feared or trusted the people. That Herbe act was the strongest piece of legislation ever passed, and it would be hard to defend it. Reported—How then do you account for the alacrity with which he approved some of the most obnoxious schemes of the ring? Senator Lowery—His undue anxiety to be re-elected led him into many acts which are not defensible. Geary wielded the power of the ring much more than he feared or trusted the people. That Herbe act was the strongest piece of legislation ever passed, and it would be hard to defend it.

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
I want the corruptions of the ring fully exposed, and the people relieved from their accused legislation. What I blame the newspapers for is that they are constantly crying out against the Legislature, hurrying their censures indiscriminately, and falling to name the guilty, while they do not sustain the faithful and honest representatives of the people. I will unite with any and all parties against the ring. I will help to smash any slate to break down the tyrannies at Harrisburg, and you know that your party has its full share in them. To engage in this I consider a party as well as a patriotic duty.

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
I like Senator Wallace, and shall be glad to unite with him in any measure of reform. He is an honest and able man. Because I defended him against the absurd charge of disloyalty, some of my enemies, when I was last a candidate, sought to use the fact against me. But they found the people of Erie county as generous as I tried to be. Wallace never fails to vote against the corrupt schemes of the ring, but he sometimes neglects to employ all his power against them. He sometimes reminds me of the good lady, who, though quite virtuous and devoted in her own conduct, did occasionally like to see the young girls enjoying themselves a little. But when thoroughly aroused against some particular enormity of legislation he blazes forth with great power and ability. The duty of the patriotic and brave job of a legislator is due to Wallace more than to any other member of the assembly. I would give him the credit of it.

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
I know nothing about the cases of Diamond and Finley except that I have seen in the newspapers. The mere fact that the claimants are republicans will not help them to seats by my vote. These are questions to be examined judicially, and I act on them as an independent Senator, not as a partisan. No more technically shall be permitted to stifle the voice of the people, but I can help it.

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
At this point, Mr. C. of Fulton county, entered, and the conversation assuming a general character, your reporter bowed himself out of the Senatorial presence, pleased and edified with the interview.

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
The women of Wyoming Territory recently granted the right of suffrage nearly about seven hundred.

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
A heavy drunk on the "water cure" going through a course of the "painful" treatment—illustrated by the "gentle" doctor.

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
The strange freaks which some of our country cousins are compelled to undergo while wandering in, and gazing around our great cities, is truly wonderful. One generation does not seem to learn from another, because the same acts are weakly if not daily reported by the press and police.

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
The following we find reported in a late number of the New York Herald, and should be a warning to all "drunks" or "greenbacks."

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
On Thursday afternoon a man claimed to be Alfred Caspicer, and residing at Clearfield for the purpose of being admitted to the Broomway as far as Homestead street, and stood in front of Ragdy the Blacksmith's saloon, halting between two opinions—whether to go or remain—and just as he came to the former conclusion a fashionably attired young lady, dressed in the style of the "girl of the period," with a pretty face, slipped him on the back and exclaimed in that style peculiar to her class, "I say, old fellow, what troubles you?"

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
Alfred looked somewhat abashed, and was both for words to reply, as the dear little creature before him, standing under a gas lamp, was in his eye, the finest specimen of femininity he had ever before encountered. Her name, pro tem, is Mary Disto.

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
His bashfulness gradually wore off, and, proffering her arm the two proceeded towards Bleeker street, Alfred as happy as a clam at high tide, with his hand resting on Mary's except, occasionally, the wife and family he had left at home and the money he had about his person; the former trouble was expelled by the thought that she was far away and would never know his unfaithfulness, and to the latter, he knew he had the money secreted away in a blind pocket in his pants. It did not need much persuasion on the part of Mary to procure Alfred's consent to accompany her to her room. No ill Bleeker street, where they were shortly afterwards joined by two of her companions, named Mary Jane Patten and Charles Jameson, the latter a nice young man and a particular friend of Mary, who had accidentally dropped in. Alfred, who is a good-natured man, concluded that a friend of Mary was a friend of his also, and as he was extravagantly arrayed in a faultless suit, with his shirt ruffled in the middle, he cultivated his acquaintance and entered into a lengthy discussion of the benefits likely to result from bestowing the elective franchise on the people of the Southern States. This nice young man fully concurred in everything that Alfred said, and before they parted had become fast friends, Alfred engaging him as head salesman in his store at the munificent salary of $2,000 per year and so on.

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
Which this conversation was being carried on, the party indulged in several drinks at the Southerner's expense, until the latter, became somewhat sleepy from long travel and worn out with bad whiskey, concluded to retire, and Jameson and his companion left the room, after taking an affectionate good night and promising to see him again on the following morning.

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
Alfred states that about one o'clock he and his companion retired, but thoughts of his family and the snoring of Mary prevented him from sleeping. He heard the clock strike two, three and four, and as the last stroke had been given to the last named hour, he surmised he heard some person leaving the room. Quietly stealing out of bed he discovered his pants were not in the position that he had left them upon retiring, and, seizing hold of them, he hastily dressed himself in the middle. Placing his hand on that portion of his pants where he had his roll concealed he discovered it was not as large as it was when retiring, and a suspicion entered his mind that the money from his place of concealment his worst suspicions were realized, as he soon discovered that the $1,000 bill and a $500 bill had been taken out.

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
Almost frantic at his loss, and apparently not knowing what he did, he threw the pants to the floor and rushed into the street with nothing on but his linen, shouting "murder," "police," "watch." While proceeding in this novel costume up Bleeker street towards Broadway office Dismas, of the Fifteenth precinct, who had just rounded the corner of Thompson street, behind him, his shirt extended at an angle of forty-five degrees, and with a very unusual posture, he surmised it was a woman and fell fainting across the sidewalk. Alfred at this moment tripped over him and also fell to the pavement. The two rose at the same moment, the peeler's hair on end, and pale from fright; but Alfred, beholding his shield and uniform, grasping his hand and commencing relating his adventures, which resulted in the officer's accompanying him to his room and arresting the three parties who had been in the room with the unfortunate Southerner, but some of the missing money could be found. The party were all conveyed before Justice Ledwith at Jefferson Market yesterday morning and remained to the station house until this morning for the purpose of procuring additional evidence against the prisoners, but in the meantime it was supposed the money or a portion of it will be refunded and the prosecution abandoned.

"The rich," said the Jew, "eat venison because it is deer. I eat venison because it is sheep."

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
A heavy drunk on the "water cure" going through a course of the "painful" treatment—illustrated by the "gentle" doctor.

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
The strange freaks which some of our country cousins are compelled to undergo while wandering in, and gazing around our great cities, is truly wonderful. One generation does not seem to learn from another, because the same acts are weakly if not daily reported by the press and police.

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
The following we find reported in a late number of the New York Herald, and should be a warning to all "drunks" or "greenbacks."

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
On Thursday afternoon a man claimed to be Alfred Caspicer, and residing at Clearfield for the purpose of being admitted to the Broomway as far as Homestead street, and stood in front of Ragdy the Blacksmith's saloon, halting between two opinions—whether to go or remain—and just as he came to the former conclusion a fashionably attired young lady, dressed in the style of the "girl of the period," with a pretty face, slipped him on the back and exclaimed in that style peculiar to her class, "I say, old fellow, what troubles you?"

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
Alfred looked somewhat abashed, and was both for words to reply, as the dear little creature before him, standing under a gas lamp, was in his eye, the finest specimen of femininity he had ever before encountered. Her name, pro tem, is Mary Disto.

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
His bashfulness gradually wore off, and, proffering her arm the two proceeded towards Bleeker street, Alfred as happy as a clam at high tide, with his hand resting on Mary's except, occasionally, the wife and family he had left at home and the money he had about his person; the former trouble was expelled by the thought that she was far away and would never know his unfaithfulness, and to the latter, he knew he had the money secreted away in a blind pocket in his pants. It did not need much persuasion on the part of Mary to procure Alfred's consent to accompany her to her room. No ill Bleeker street, where they were shortly afterwards joined by two of her companions, named Mary Jane Patten and Charles Jameson, the latter a nice young man and a particular friend of Mary, who had accidentally dropped in. Alfred, who is a good-natured man, concluded that a friend of Mary was a friend of his also, and as he was extravagantly arrayed in a faultless suit, with his shirt ruffled in the middle, he cultivated his acquaintance and entered into a lengthy discussion of the benefits likely to result from bestowing the elective franchise on the people of the Southern States. This nice young man fully concurred in everything that Alfred said, and before they parted had become fast friends, Alfred engaging him as head salesman in his store at the munificent salary of $2,000 per year and so on.

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
Which this conversation was being carried on, the party indulged in several drinks at the Southerner's expense, until the latter, became somewhat sleepy from long travel and worn out with bad whiskey, concluded to retire, and Jameson and his companion left the room, after taking an affectionate good night and promising to see him again on the following morning.

OUR SATURDAY NIGHT.
Alfred states that about one o'clock he and his companion retired, but thoughts of his family and the snoring of Mary prevented him from sleeping. He heard the clock strike two, three and four, and as the last stroke had been given to the last named hour, he surmised he heard some person leaving the room. Quietly stealing out of bed he discovered his pants were not in the position that he had left them upon retiring, and, seizing hold of them, he hastily dressed himself in the middle. Placing his hand on that portion of his pants where he had his roll concealed he discovered it was not as large as it was when retiring, and a suspicion entered his mind that the money from his place of concealment his worst suspicions were realized
