RELIGIOUS VENERING.

The solid and substantial furniture of our fathers is supplanted in the fashionable parlors of today with much more ornate but far less durable furniture in gilt and veneer. So the homely but substantial virtues of the past appear old-fashioned by the side of the cheap but more pretentious imitations of the present. Honored phrases and stimulated sentiments pass current for philanthropy and religion. Men who hardly concede that there is a God talk glibly about the True, the Beautiful, the Good. Men that are endeavoring to dissolve the marriage tie, and remit the family to the chaos of a worse than savage life, give expression to the most exalted sentiments of purity, and write poetry about love exactly as though they really believed in it. As the coffin and the corpse are often covered with flowers that hide death but do not prevent decay, so men whose moral nature is dead so cover their corrupt and corrupting sentiments and doctrines with pretty smiles and high-flown phrases, that one can hardly tell whether he is looking at a coffin or a corpse. As the words of the stoutest infidels have read the Bible enthusiastically for its poetry and its eloquence, so a good many to whom the experiences it portrays are quite foreign catch its language, and even come by imagination to comprehend something of those experiences, and to embody them in forms exquisitely beautiful. A good many of these good men may ascribe for the time the part of Shylock, and personify the vindictive racial admirably. On the other hand, one utterly devoid of humane and generous sentiments may quite as effectively play the part of a hero, so long as there is no real exigency to test the reality of his heroism.

Nor are such experiences always genuinely simulated. Some are the contradictions of human nature, and one utterly devoid of Christian or even truly humane and generous principles may not only affect but really feel for the moment a transient sense of their transcendent glory. Moore, for the highest prize will be paid. Cleverness on hand and ready for sale at the lowest market prices.
