WEDNESDAY MORNING, MARCH 6, 1872. Lectures in a Workshop. If there is a dignity in labor, if the means of education are accessible to all, if intelligence is certaily recognized, what is there to prevent the me chanic from elevating himself and striving for an exalted position? And yet out of the thousands of talented designers and ingenious mechanicians, there are very few who arrive at any degree of eminence. It is a manifest truth, that large numbers of those ongaged in mechanical pursuit seldom to execute all orders in their line of busine trouble their heads about mental improvement. After work hours their ture of material for house building, such as ime is frittered away in trifling; too often, we know, in vicious amuse-ments which absorb their attention on the following day, to the exclusion of the thought that should be given to their employment. Now, the remedy against such a worthless existence is to go to work and use every opportunity to improve the mind and learn as much as possible about everything connected with the trade or employ ment that serves for daily occupa It can searcely be expected, after eight or ten hours' unremitting labor, that a workman should the himself down night after night to study. He says he must have relaxation and amusement, and will produce arguments ap-parently plausible in order to get rid of the responsibility of self culture and mental improvement. But the man who would educate himself must have the disposition to learn. He may be chained to a shoebench, or fastened to a printing-press, or stand at a lathe or WEAVER & BETTS and yet, in his close observation of men and manners, in his education of thought, in his careful husbanding of spare moments, in judicious reading, in availing himself of all attainable means for educating himself, benefiting his fellow-creatures, and becoming a useful and intelligent member of society, he will feel his self improvement, the world growing larger, and his own soul growing with it; he will see a significance in his being, and in the world about him, of which the HATS & CAPS, manufactured scholar never dreamed. To every reflecting person it must be evident, that an educated man, skilled n his trade, with a knowledge of the laws on which it is founded, is much more valuable to his employer and nimself than the mere workman whose At the most reasonable rates for CASH or actions are akin to those of a machine, whose mind is a waste, and who sel-dom thinks. There are many narratives of the success of carnest seekers Square Timber, Boards, Shingles, after education and scientific pursuits amidst the discouragements of opposition and poverty. Franklin rose from the position of a printer's boy to that of a prince among philoso-phers; John Fitch, who built in 1811 the first steamboat for the navigation of the Western waters, cultivated a potato patch in order to purchase a copy of Salmon's Geography; Sir Richard Arkwright, "the subterranean barber," was the inventor of the cot ton-machine; Sam Crompton played "Cheaper than the Cheapest!" the violin at an English theatre for eighteen pence each night, to enable him to procure tools to make his spinning-mule, and the Government subse quently assigned to him £5,000 as a national reward; Chantrey, the great portrait sculptor, carried out milk in Sheffield; Murray, the great linguist, Jearned to write by scribbling his let ters on an old wool card with the end of a burnt heather stem; William Cobbett made himself master of En glish grammer when he was a private of England, was a Parliamentary reporter; Charles Dickens was once a Spring and Summer trade, we are now ready wyer's clerk, and such a position in to furnish all kinds of Goods England is neither a Incrative nor an enviable one; Faraday, one of the orightest luminaries of science, was a bookbinder's assistant. Therefore there is no degree of distinction which is not open to the mechanic; enlightened | would most respectfully ask for a continuance workers will be appreciated us well as of the same. nd laborers can reap the fruits of their industry as well as mere speculators in labor. In what chanics educate themselves?-In the great workshop of the brain there are discovery, invention, ingennity, perception, and design; these, see in motion and carefully watched. will cause the advancement of the arts for Grain, Wool and all kinds of Lumber and ting properties, and will not disagree or offend the and professions, of scionce and learn-Country Produce. ing, a knowledge of new traths which unlock a world of wonders. PENSION SWINDLERS -According to the Commissioner, as reported by General Garfield in the House of Representatives, the United States government has on its pension lists one swindler in every four persons who receive the national bounty-about eight millions of dollars being thus squandered on thieves every year.— The names of these persons have been placed on the rolls through the frauds of pension agents. It was only a few days ago that a bill was passed in the extending the time within which application for pensions may be made and arrearages secored. The Senate committee is already understood to be opposed to extending the scope of the pension laws, and with this important information before it, an adverse re-port on this birl will undoubtedly be made. The proposed appropriation to enable the Commissioner to expose the alleged frauds will be well expended if even a quarter of the eight millions now lost annually be saved .-North Star.
