How Tyrene Received its Name.

A correspondent of the Bellefonte Watchman gives the following amusing account of how the village of Tyrone obtained its name. We would not vouch for its certainty, but it is worth reading, anyhow:

"We might say volumes in favor of this fine town and its good people.—
There has been considerable doubt in the minds of the people as to how and the minds of the minds of the people as to how and the minds of the people as to how and the minds of the people as to how and the minds of the people as to how and the minds of the people as to how and the minds of the people as to how and the minds of the people as we will settle that point here before going further: Many years ago an old man might have been seen riding to the store (this being the only store for many miles around,) upon an old roan mare. His son, Eben, walked alongside. I don't know why he walked, unless it was because his daddy wouldn't let him ride. As I said by wouldn't let him ride. As I said dy wouldn't let him ride. As I said, they were going to the store for groceries. Across the old mare's back was a bag with a gallon jug in either end, which they intended to have filled with groceries. Some called it whiskey. They arrived at the store, whiskey. They arrived at the store, bought one pound of crackers and two gallons of liquid groceries, then started for home, the cld man astride of old roan. They went but a short distance until the old gent discovered the supply of whiskey was not equal to the erackers, when he alighted, handed the reins to the boy and started for another quart. As he did so, he said to the boy, "Tie Roan." The boy was thoughtless and left the animal stand, whilst he went off to sip some sap from a sugar tree near by. Upon sap from a sugar tree near by. Upon returning, the old man saw the mare loose and making off with the grocer-ies upon her back. He yelled to Eben, saying, "You internal young scoundrel, Tie Roan!" The boy merely looked up from his sap sipping and said, "Oh, for a thousand tongues." The father yelled and swore and said, "Why the devil didn't you Tie Roan?"
Becoming enraged he threw a stone at Eben, which might have hit him, had he not been too far off. This racket frightened the animal, when she started on a run down the hill, stumbled and broke her neck, and, of course, spilled the contents of the jug. The old man became deranged over this misfortune, and for a whole day and night all he could say was "The Roan." The merchant, who was an FLOUR. illiterate sort of a man, the next day

A Curious Law Suit.

Two mill owners on the Wissahiekon creek, above Chestnut Hill, says the Philadephia Ledger, engaged in a curious law suit, which was decided last week at Norristown. The mills are three quarters of a mile apart, and the stream between them has not much fall. In 1823 the owner of the upper mill brought suit againts the lower mill for having backed the water up into the race of the upper mill. Under decree of the Court, the sheriff put ap four permanent marks to estab-lish the lawful surface of the water.— At places holes drilled in fixed rocks a marble stone was set in the tailrace of the upper dam and properly marked, and a pin was driven into a buttonwood tree just thirty-one inches above the surface at the breast of the dam. The mills have changed owners since that time, but recently the race of the upper mill has been overflowed by back water, and the owner brought suit for damages. Careful surveys were made, and the water was found to be four inches above the marks in fixed rocks and on the marble slab, but exactly thirty-one inches from the plug that had been driven into the button wood tree forty-eight years ago.
The question for the jury to decide was whether the upper mill and rocks sunk four inches, or whether the base of the button wood tree bad been lifted that much. Notwithstanding ingenious arguments to show that trees only expanded in size and sent out only expanded in size and sent out new growths from the extremities of branches, the jury, composed of farm-ers or those bred in the country, de-cided that the buttonwood tree had been elongated, by giving a verdict for the plaint of for $150.
