PRUNING TREES AND VINES

It is a common saying among practical horticulturists, that the best time to prune a plant is when such an operation is discovered to be necessary, and a man him a sharp knife in his pocket. This should not, however, be considered as literally true, although volumes of nonsense have been written in regard to particular days or months in which certain kinds of plants should be pruned. It is not well to prune vines or trees just at the time the sap begins to flow the most rapidly in Spring, because it is likely to issue from the wounds, discovered to be necessary, and It is not well to prune vines or trees just at the time the sap begins to flow the most rapidly in Spring, because it is likely to issue from the wounds, discovered to be necessary, and it is not well to prune vines or trees just at the time the sap begins to flow the most rapidly in Spring, because it is likely to issue from the wounds, discovered to prune vines or trees just at the time the sap begins to flow the most rapidly in Spring, because it is likely to issue from the wounds, discovered to prune vines or trees just at the time the sap begins to flow the most rapidly in Spring, because it is likely to issue from the wounds of the plants book unsightly, even if no further injury follows. But if trees or vines are pruned early enough to insure a good frosting of the wounds for a few nights before the sap begins to flow, there will be little danger of what is usually termed bleeding. In many Northern localities this may yet be done, and those who have neglected to prune the call the prune vines or trees and similar plants required.
