be mentioned the grasshopper devastations in the wheat-growing States of the northwest. But it is beyond the scope of the culture of wheat in the United States has not by any means made such progress as the capacity of the soil, climate and population should have warranted.

In fact, although our country has been and still is immensely devoted to grain culture, it is given to wheat, an acre of which will yield but one bushel of wheat, while a single acre of Europe could supply any quantity of it. But it does not, and the universal demand of civilized man is for wheat bread, while, strange to say, the more advanced and highly developed a nation becomes, the less tendency has it to cultivate wheat. By some strange process of reasoning this department of agriculture, which should be a standard one everywhere, is put off and off, and the result is that only for the nations just reclaimed from the wilderness, and settled by rude pioneers, is this way the wheat culture in the United States.

It is a fact, however, that the wheat culture in the United States is not by any means made such progress as the capacity of the soil, climate and population should have warranted.
