He was found, however. The wily villian had laid his plans well, and contrived to get clear away, carrying with him a large sum of money, and nearly all my sister's more valuable wedding gifts.

These he had taken from a room within my mother's, and in returning had probably aroused her. There had been no struggle, and he had evidently first strangled, and then murdered her as she lay.

It was long very long, ere I recovered from this terrible shock. In fact I never have recovered. My unavailing regrets and never dying remerse have made me a sad and hopeless man, for did I not direct the roober's footsteps and arm the assassin's hand.

That was my first and last mas-querade. Years that scent to stretch to centuries, have passed since that day of horror. True I am still a young man, but though my days exceed by far the allotted age of man, I never can forget, nor will the mem-ory of my fatal folly ever be blotted
