0, give no leed unto the row That fickle man hath spoken; Ite's plotting to deceive you now-His vows are lightly broken.

He'll win a maiden's heart to day, To morrow he will leave her! The more she trusts to what he says, The more he will deceive her.

Each maid his selfish words beguile

Adds to his satisfaction ; Deception lurks beneath his smile, And governs every action.

Then give no beed unto the vow That fickle man hath spoken; He's plotting to deceive you now, His vows are lightly spoken.

MAN'S COMPLAINT.

Knowest fliou' that woman's love is naught, But van and empty treasure ! Knowest thou that woman's heart is caught By every idle pleasure?

The love her maiden bosen knows Soon leaves her beart forever; Though deep and strong the passion glows, And rages like a fever.

Know, then, that woman's false as fair; That, like the bee, she ranges; Still seeking flowers more sweet and rare, As lickle fancy changes.

Ah, yes! the love that first can warm, Soon leaves her heart forever ;

Some second passion soon will charm-Love changes like a fever!

THE KILLED IN BATTLE .- When the Greek stood forth with only ten thousand men, to repel the Persian army of five hundred thousand, the slain left on the field numbered no less than two hundred thousand. At the battle of Marengo, the Austriche lost six thousand in killed and twelve thousand taken prisoners, while the number of French who were killed, is said to have been far greater. At Leipsic, the united armies of France, Austria, Russia and Prussia, amounted to four handred thousand, and when the conflict closed eighty thousand men had been slain, one-half of whom were French,-who also lost sixty-five pieces of artillery. At Waterioo, the French left twenty thousand dead on the field of battle, having lost many more in their retreat, and the whole number of their guns captured was three hundred: the English lost thirteen thousand men, six hundred officers, and thirteen generals; the Prussian loss was also great, but not now remembered. The whole force of the French engaged was one hundred and fifty thousand
