Miscellaneous.

CHASED BY THE ALABAMA.

"Thou comest in such a questionable shape." Shakespeare.

Without getting into all the particulars of the various movements attendant upon a vessel's getting under way, I will briefly say that on a certain day in April last, the swift-sailing bark "Benjamin Franklin" sailed from the port of Havana, with an assorted cargo.

In the forcible language of Jack Cavin, her commander, she was a "screecher," and if all the stories he told as to her marvelous speed were correct, she was a wonderful craft indeed.

The glorious sunlight of the day soared higher and higher into the deep, deep blue, watching the spray bound up before the vessel's bows and then fall like a shower of liquid diamonds upon the deck; yet as he watched it all came fond recollections of the dark-eyed beauty he had left behind, and with a sigh he thought that every bound the vessel made over the surging sea placed a greater space between him and the being whom he loved better than any one on earth.

Old Jack came up at this moment, his face beaming with good humor, followed by the colored steward, who bore on a tray two large goblets filled with a rose-colored liquid, which glimmered pleasantly between limps of ice.

Dornford was easily persuaded by the worthy Captain to appropriate a glass of the compound to his own use, and having like Dick Swiveller assuaged his thirst in a "modest quencher," he accompanied his host down to breakfast.

The forenoon passed without any adventure of special moment, the wind had veered somewhat to the westward, but still held sufficiently fair for their purpose, and our hero passed the morning in a half-drowsy state, partly listening to the Captain's account of various adventures by sea and by land, and partly occupied in building castles in the air, in which the young lady he had left behind him formed a very important piece of furniture.

Dinner had just ended when the man on the lookout cried—"A sail on the port bow."

"What does she look like?" shouted Jack as he rushed upon deck, his mouth crammed with plum pudding.

"A large bark rigged vessel bearing right down upon us."

The ruddy countenance of the poor skipper turned to a sort of dull leaden hue, as with a trembling hand he seized his glass and took a long, anxious view of the approaching vessel.

At length with a deep sigh he lowered the glass, and turning to Dornford he gasped out:

"Yes, it's that pesky pirate, scoundrel, she's lowered her flag, but she can't fool this child, I can make out her damned old guns and—Ready about ship, there, and in ten minutes afterwards the 'Benjamin Franklin' was edging off to the southwest as fast as every stitch of her canvass would carry her.

"That 'ere ship," said Cavin, shaking his fist at the supposed pirate—"that 'ere ship is the plague of my life, and of every skipper in the gulf; why don't the President sent out a proclamation after her, and abolish her, or something of that kind?"

"Yes, said he, 'I can count the guns on board of her, one, two, three, four, five, six, oh, what whoppers! We shall have one of them ripping right into us in about a minute."

For two hours did the chase continue, and the 'pirate,' if anything, rather gained on them, though, to the great delight of Jack, she did not bring her steam power into use, and he came to the conclusion that she was either out of coals, or her engines had broken down, and if he could carry on until nightfall, he should be able in the darkness to give her the slip.

The wind had shifted round considerably, and they were now heading direct for Havana. As the afternoon wore on the vessel gained on them visibly, being evidently better on a full wind than the 'Benjie.' As she approached nearer and nearer the anxiety of poor Cavin became terrific.

"Haul that weather clew gawg, you lubbers," he roared, "do you want to be coupled two and two, and sent to blazes on board that damned pirate?"

Still in spite of all his efforts, the stranger neared them until her formidable broadside became clearly visible to the naked eye. The perspiration bubbled out of the Captain's forehead, and streamed down his cheeks as, in company with Dornford, he watched the movements of the other vessel, whose intention was now clearly to overhaul them.

Presently she hoisted the Stars and Stripes at her mizzen peak, evidently desirous to 'speak.'

"Oh, yes," said Jack, as he observed the national emblem flutter in the breeze, "you may hoist any flag you please, but I know you anyhow you can fix it; and the Captain sighed for 'right or Wilkes!'"

"Darn you," said he, apostrophizing the latter gentleman, "you and your flying squadron are never where they are wanted. You are pretty good at raising a muss with a furnace, but when that confounded 'Alabama' ever was a shrewd Yankee, and in order to compel the Confederate privateer to keep her distance, should they chance to come within sight, he hit upon the somewhat novel expedient of cutting away five or six port-holes on either side of his vessel, from which projected the trunk of many trees, which painted and fixed to look as much like guns as possible, would at a little distance give his vessel the appearance of a heavily armed United States cruiser. Thus disguised did the gallant Crossrees
