A STARLING DISCOVERY .- For several days past, says the Detroit Free Press, workmen have been engaged in excavating the earth in front of the Seitz Build ing, on Griswold street, for the purpose of constructing vaults beneath the side walk. At a distance of five or six feet below the surface, they came upon the remnants of an old sewer, supposed to have been constructed by the famous Indian warrior Pontiac during the siege of Detroit, if not by somebody else subsequently. It is said that this daring Indian chieftan conceived the ingenious device of constructing a sewer from his camp, under the walls of the fort, and into the midst of his enemies. He believed that the odor arising therefrom would cause the English to open the gates for fresh air, when he and his devoted followers would rush in and captue the fort. Like some similar modern enterprises, the sewer was a failure, but the fragments discoverd by the workmen on Griswold street are sufficient to show that Pontiac had the right idea of what a sewer should be.
