He was the second boy who started the boot black trade in Harrisburg. Yesterday the 93d regiment arrived, and had no sooner commenced its march on Market street than this old boot black was recognized by his numerous disciples who surrounded and greeted him in a most affectionate manner. Many shed tears. One seized his musket determined to carry that to camp, another his haversack and canteen, desiring to relieve him of that burden, and still another his knapsack, all showing the regard and high estimation in which they held their old comrade in the boot black trade.
