shadow that she saw across the 'line of life,' was the shadow of Storms' mills. The trial proceeded rapidly; a few witnesses were hurriedly sworn, and testified damagingly for the prisoner's case. At last Hafer Stanley was called to the stand.
"I went down to the mills to see that all was right," this witness said. "Saw a man emerge from the lower door, and enter the grove. A moment later the fire broke out in the third story. Recognize the prisoner as the man. Saw nobody else about the mills."
He was the last witness. Luke Colby said he had none to offer. The court had his solemn denial of the crime; it could condemn or acquit, as it saw fit.
As he finished speaking, George Storms made her appearance. Her face was flushed, and she looked more beautiful than ever. The crowd respectfully made way for her, and she entered the arena before the judge. She glanced from her lover to Hafer Stanley, and cried:
'Swear me!'
Surprised, every one exchanged curious glances.
She was sworn.
'Two hours since, I saw Hafer Stanley enter the mill, with a small basket under his arm. He left the door ajar, and I followed. He ascended to the third story, and took a kerosene can from the basket. The contents of the can he poured upon a heap of shavings and pine knots in one corner of the room. Then I hurried away. I saw him take up a position from whence he could watch a figure in the grove. When the fire burst forth, Hafer Stanley held his voice, and glanced at the man in the grove. That man was Luke Colby. Can't you see through the villainy? I can. Hafer Stanley fired the mills for the purpose of putting him out of his way. There is love mixed in this case, but it isn't on Hafer Stanley's side. Hafer Stanley, do I lie?'
The accused started back, and in the terrible glare and heat, his face was as white as a burial shroud.
Several men sprang forward, and seized him.
'The girl has told the truth,' he said. 'I applied the match to the mills. I hated him, because she loved him.'
Reader, I would gladly omit a portion of the scene that followed. Another man was put in Luke Colby's place, and after a brief trial twelve men said 'guilty.' And the jury executed its own verdict.
Storm's mills were entirely consumed but other and handsomer structures soon rose on the blackened site. And the name of the greater firm was 'Storms & Colby.' For, having discovered Luke's worth, and finding him respected by the people, Elias Storm willingly gave him his daughter's hand.
He often recalls the gipsy's prophecy, and shudders to think how near death he stood, when he waited for George in the shadows of the mills. She was keeping the appointment, when she saw Hafer Stanley enter the buildings with basket and can, and suspecting the wily man, she followed him, to witness the diabolical work of his hands.

She said perhaps that would be the better way.
The Woodstock Standard says the meanest man in Vermont lives in Chester. He was invited to join in singing at the funeral of one of his neighbors' daughters. He accepted the invitation, and soon thereafter presented to the father of the deceased a claim for fifty cents for services rendered on that occasion. The bill was paid.
One day last week a smiling infant toddled away from his home near Viola, Iowa, on the Dubuque Southwestern Railroad, and lay down between the rails to sleep. A few moments later a train came along and the engineer, seeing he could not stop in time, pulled her wide open and banged the whole train over the sleeping cherub before it woke and never touched a hair of it. Had the little one attempted to raise it would have been killed instantly.
