

Dying with his Boots on.

THE CIVIL METHOD OF SETTLING DIFFICULTIES IN FRANKLIN, TENNESSEE.

From the Nashville American.

There was a want of appreciation between Col. House and Sheriff Griffin which amounted to positive enmity. Griffin, accompanied by Recorder Allison, met Col. House in Butler's saloon. Griffin told House that he was a d---dascal, and House told Griffin that he was a d---d liar. A scuffle ensued in which House's scalp was severely gashed by Griffin's mace. While in the doctor's office having his wounds dressed, Col. House heard the door open, and also heard the click of a revolver. He asked, "Who's that?" immediately after exclaiming, "Why, it is Allison!" Col. House desired to know of Allison what he meant by doing as he did at the saloon that night, when Allison said "a d---d sight." House then told him he wanted to talk to him, and asked him why he had brought his pistol there. Seeing there was likely to be a difficulty, Dr. Gentry took House back into the store, while his assailant, shoved Allison out of the door. When first addressed by House, Allison had his pistol cocked and leveled at him.

Thursday morning House went to Allison's office and told him the difficulty might as well be settled there and then, and invited him out. Col. House, accompanied by his son Manse, met Griffin and Allison in the street. At this juncture, it is said, Griffin and Allison held a consultation, the purport of which was that Allison, as the Recorder, urged Griffin to arrest House, and Griffin said that he would arrest and manage House, but was afraid his son, Manse, would shoot him, and suggested that Allison should assist him and keep a look out for Manse, as people would think strange of it if he, Griffin, did not arrest Col. House.

Griffin went toward House at a rapid gait, Allison lagging behind. Griffin had both his revolvers and mace in hand. Taking House by the collar rather violently, as some assert, he gave him a jerk. House told him that he would go but that he did not want to be forced or dragged along, or words to that effect. As they were about to start away Manse House came to the door of the store with a pistol in hand. When Griffin saw him, he asked if he intended to draw that pistol on him, at the same time placing his own weapon over Col. House's shoulder, and covering Manse House's body. Young House, whose hand was hanging downward, responded that he "did not."

Thereupon Col. House said he would, and commenced drawing his pistol, when Griffin immediately brought his pistol down on Col. House and shot him. At the first fire by Griffin they separated, House retreating slowly backward toward the middle of the street, and Griffin toward the corner, in such a manner as to have fall range at both Col. House and his son. Immediately after Griffin shot Col. House, the latter stooping down as the ball struck. Griffin then shot at Col. House twice, striking him both times, and snapping the cap on the fifth chamber. He had shot Col. House three times, while House continued to snap his revolver at Griffin, and at one time exclaiming "Oh, pshaw!" as if provoked at the failure of the caps to explode. House had nearly crossed the street in an oblique direction from Griffin when Recorder Allison, who stood behind the corner of Cayce's store, shot at him, House immediately falling to his knees. He seemed not to have anticipated a fire from that quarter, because while in the position described he attempted once more to fire at Griffin. Another shot from Allison, and Col. House fell back a corpse.

It is generally admitted by those who witnessed the affair that Recorder Allison fired the fatal shot. It is further stated that Allison, on entering the store, ran under the counter, and unloaded the chambers of his pistol, and placed the weapon far up under the counter. When Manse House fell he said, "Oh, I am hurt." A young friend then offered him a shot gun which was standing in the store, and was said to be Manse's, but he said it was of no avail, as he could not use it. In the excitement of the moment the friend picked up the gun, ran into the crowd which had now gathered upon the scene, and attempted to shoot Griffin, but it only snapped.

Col. House received five wounds, the most serious of which was made by a shot entering his body from the right side, between the sixth and seventh ribs, passing through his lungs, and completely penetrating his body. The second was in the left groin, penetrating the pelvic cavity. The third was on the right, striking the bone dancing around, so to speak, and was extracted from the right buttock. The fourth was through the right arm. The fifth struck the right shoulder, and was imbedded therein. The ball by which Manse House was wounded struck the pelvis below the abdomen, and ranged round, lodging against the hip bone, as is believed, but not proved. It may prove mortal, though there are some chances in young House's favor, among which is the weather.
