THE SILENT HEART.

BY E. W.
Mrs. Hartley was seated in a small, rather cheerless sitting-room, engaged in the lonely occupation of stocking darning; while opposite to her, Sarah, her only child, with folded hands, looked out of the cottage window. There had been a tall figure passing down the path that led to the little gate, but long before that, that was out of sight. Still Sarah sat there, her dark, mournful eyes looking out upon the dusty road, her beautiful mouth folded in lines of pathos, touching in one so young.

Busily the shining needle went in and out of the stockings, and sometimes the mother cast a wistful glance at the lovely face opposite to her, as if longing to comfort or advise. It was strangely pathetic to see the little white hands, that were always so busy, lying idle in the forenoon, the cheerful features so absorbed and sad.

At last, Sarah broke the long, painful silence. "Mother," she said, "is it my duty to marry Charles Everhard?" "Your duty, Sarah? Have you no warmer word to use when you talk of marrying a man to whom we owe so great a debt of gratitude?" "No, mother. I am grateful to him, but I do not love him."

"Yet he loves you devotedly." "If I could only believe that!" Sarah sighed. "If I were only sure he loved me!" "You are too romantic, Sarah. Think for a moment. We were miserably poor, living in an attic, doing slop-work for the bare necessities of life, when accident threw you in Charles Everhard's way."

"Was it accident? I have often thought it was strange that he should have stood so very near when I was insulted for the only time in the street. It has often troubled me that I thought I detected a glance pass between the man who was rude to me and my gallant deliverer. It was rather dramatic, mother, that sudden rush to protect me."

"But think, Sarah, of the great delicacy exhibited in his kindness since that time. His introduction to me was certainly a gentlemanly method of obtaining permission to call. Then his procuring this cottage for us upon such easy terms, and the work we are doing, so pleasant and yet so well paid. And surely, Sarah, if we were still as rich as we were when your father died, you could not have been wooed with more respect than Charles Everhard constantly shows you."

"I know all you would urge, mother; and yet the fact remains—he does not love me!" "He is a man who might marry well in his own circle, Sarah. His father is one of our leading lawyers, and your poor uncle had a great respect for him."

"Uncle Herbert, mother?" "Yes, dear, who died in Australia last year. Poor fellow, after slaving there for nearly twenty years, he must have died poor."

"Why?" "I am his only living relative, dear, excepting yourself, and if he had left any property, we should have heard of it."

"Yes, I have heard you say so. I wish he had left you a little money. Ever so little would enable us to throw off this burden of obligation. It crushes me! I had rather be back in our attic, and know we were independent. Mother! mother! I cannot marry Charles Everhard!"

"Yet you have all to gain by such a marriage, Sarah, nothing to lose!" "I should lose my self-respect, my happiness for life. No, mother, though I may seem ungrateful, I'll not marry where there is no love."

But Charles Everhard did not patiently bear the rejection of the beautiful girl he had persistently wooed for many long months. He had, as Sarah suspected, planned the apparently chance encounter which first brought him to the notice and grateful acknowledgement of the widow and her daughter. He had spent valuable time and no small amount of money in following up this introduction, and having, as he believed won Sarah's affection, he asked her to be his wife.

And Sarah, with only the pure instincts of her own maiden heart to guide her, had refused his offer. With his heart full of bitter revenge, he tried to win by cruelty what he had failed to gain by kindness. Before a week passed he urged his suit with Mrs. Hartley. With affectionate words she told him of her own regret at Sarah's decision, but absolutely refused to use her influence to alter it. Then, when vague hints were thrown out to waken her fears, a stately dignity replaced the motherly warmth of her manner, and Charles Everhard was courteously but distinctly informed that Sarah could never be won by bribe or threat.

But a few days were allowed for reflection before the landlord of the little cottage raised the rent to such an exorbitant amount that only immediate removal remained for the Hartleys. The easy lucrative work was taken away at an hour's notice, and when Sarah went to the slop-warehouse for which she had formerly worked, employment was denied her there. Winter was coming on, and the narrow attic room seemed even more dreary than before, in contrast to their cosy cottage.

Mrs. Hartley spoke once in terms that quieted any pain her daughter might have felt on her account.

"Sarah," she said, "I shudder to think of your life in the power of a man who could so wreak his revenge upon two helpless women. It is fortunate, my child, your heart guided you truly. No man who ever loved you could so suddenly become your enemy."

As she spoke there was a knock at the door, and Charles Everhard came in, to meet a chilling reception. Not abruptly, but by graceful transitions, he led the way to his hope that Sarah might think more kindly of the offer refused before. He spoke eloquently of his love for her, delicately urged his respect and affection for her mother, and expressed the most profound regret that he had ever allowed his anger at her first refusal to influence him, as it had done, to acts of enmity.

But he pleaded in vain. Sarah firmly refused to become an unloved, unloving wife.

There was little sleep in the cheerless attic that night; but the morning found the Hartleys up early, and Sarah prepared to go out in search of work. The postman's voice rang along the narrow passage.

"Hartley!" "An answer to our advertisement!" cried Sarah, flying down for the letter and up again.

Then Mrs. Hartley, gave a startled cry at the deathly pallor of the face lifted to meet her eyes.

"Mother," Sarah said, in a hushed voice, "can you bear a shock of joy? Rather a novel sensation for you and me. This letter tells me my Uncle Herbert left a will!"

"Yes, Sarah! Speak quickly, child." "In care of Everhard & Hill, to be opened upon my twenty-first birthday. Charles Everhard's father, mother, has had this will since Uncle Herbert died."

"I begin to understand, dear. Then you are an heiress—"

"To one hundred thousand dollars!" "There was no more want or cold for the heiress or her mother. It was three years later when Sarah was sought for a wife by one who loved her and won the treasure of her love; and the warm, true heart no longer held the silence that once saved the lovely girl from becoming the unloved, unloving wife of an unscrupulous fortune-hunter."
