CUPID ON 'CHANGE.

Chaffer & Prigg had put their means and wits together to do a miscellaneous business in Higgleford, where they soon became the two keenest hands at a trade in that dickering little town.—Why, they would snap up a bargain while Toby Squareman, one of your slow-but-sure sort, was trening himslow-but-sure sort, was turning himself about

Percival Prigg, the junior partner, was a dashing young buck, a great ladies' man, and a candidate for matrimony-with the mental reservation, always, that the transaction must be a paying one. Perhaps he would have pushed matters a little faster in that line but for a question which perplexed him. Minnie Sparks was young and handsome; the widow Wheedleman was neither; but both were rich—which was the richer, that was the question that troubled Mr. Prigg.

He managed to divide his attentions pretty equally between the two, with out committing himself to either. The widow he felt sure of whenever he chose to speak the word. The difficulty was to put off speaking it, she had such a direct way of coming to the point. With Minnie the case was different.

To reach his ends with her, required nice tact and management. At times he was almost driven to down-right courtship. But, at last, he felt sure, that without going too far, he had made an impression; and he only waited to find means to strike a balance between their fortunes in order to determine whether it was the widow or Minnie Sparks that was to be Mrs. Percival Prigg.

At this time came a great excitement. The speculating world was thrown into a fever. Some one had invented a plan to enable railway trains to furnish their own tracks. As soon as the last car passed, the rails would be taken up by machinery, carried forward, and laid down again in front. The Endless Track Company had purchased the pa-tent, and the stock was selling at fabulous prices, which everybody said would be trebled in a month.

"I think I shall go to the country for a few days' shooting," said Percival Prigg to his partner one day in the slack of the season. "It would do you good, I think," "It would do you good, I think," said Chaffer.

Instead of looking up his hunting equipments, Mr. Prigg went to the bank and drew out fully half the firm's balance, and then took the first train for the city.

"Buy me five hundred Endless Track!" he shouted, rushing into the office of Gorem Brothers, a celebrated "buli" firm, and throwing down the money for the margin.

"All right, sir," said the sleek clerk, taking up the money and entering the order.

Percival walked out a happy man. He would be a millionaire in less than ten days. He would return the amount he had taken of the firm's funds, and his partner, whom he didn't intend to share the profits of this stroke, need be none the wiser. By the next train Mr. Chaffer reached the city, having drawn from the bank most of what was left to the firm's out of breath, into the office of De Bruin

& Cubb. Chaffer, be it understood, was a feroclearer, se it understood, was a fero-cious "bear." He had no doubt but stocks, generally, were on the point of tumbling, and that Endless Track, in particular, would be down to zero in a fortnight. He, too, contemplated a fortnight. He, too, contemplated a nice little "spec" on his own account, without "letting on" to his partner.

The margin was paid and Mr. Chafter's order taken, that gentleman returning home by the evening express; for he wished to be at his post when Mr. Prigg got back from his shooting. The latter's absence proved shorter than had been expected. The shorting was poor, it seems, and a few days had sufficed to tire him.

Morning after morning the two partners, who were accustomed to breakfast together in bachelor style, glanced cagerly over the city papers, devouring the financial articles with a flutter of anxiety which each did his test to con-Well. Flash was in want, so the barwain was

One day Mr. Chaffer uttered a suppressed exclamation of joy. He had just opened a letter from which dropped a check for a large amount. It was for his gains on Endless Truck, which, since his "short" safe, had suddenly dropped to almost nothing, and Messrs. De Bruin & Cubb had seized the oppor-tunity to "close" for their customer,

Mr. Prigg was too busy with his paper to notice his friend's exultation. "Blazes!" he exclaimed through his

"Blazes!" he exclaimed through his clenched teeth.

"What's the matter?" inquired Chaffer, with the blandness of a man entirely happy.

"Endless Track gone to smash!" growled the other.

"I always said it would," said Chaffer. "But what of it?—we've kept out of it."

"I haven't," returned Prigg: "half

"I haven't," returned Prigg; "half our capital's in it !!"

Chaffer gave a start; but the recollection of the check in his packet in a measure composed him. He, at any rate, would be a gainer on the whole.

"There's one consolation, though," Prigg continued. "Those rascals, De Bruin & Cubb, who did so much to run the stock down, I see got caught on Soapbubble Preferred, and have failed Soappuble Preferred, and have failed for a million."

"Whew!" whistled Chaffer, whose check, of course, was worthless.
It was now Prigg's turn to ask what the matter was. Chaffer made a clean preast of it. What was to be done was the past energies.

the widow or Miss Sparke, without a moment's delay—nut wh—what's this?"—glancing at a paragraph which had just caught his eye—"Kyte & Co., too, have gone up. Didn't Miss Sparks keep her money there?"

"Of course she did—I found that out a month ago."

"Then you must marry the widow."

"The widow be it," said Prigg, with a sigh of resignation.

a sigh of resignation.

And the widow it was. She offered no coy pleas for delay, and the nupital knot was speedily fied. "A-a-i--the fact is," stammered Prigg over his coffee one morning, "I find myself deucedly short at present, my dear, and—and if you only could my dear, and—and if you only could now—that is, you see, your cheek for a thousand or so—"

"Nothing could give me more pleas-ure, Percy, dear," interrupted the lady; "but, you see, that provoking Endless Track—"
"What!—did you, too, put your money in it?"

"Every cent I had in the world, Percy, dear; but then, you know, you and everybody said it was so safe, and that the money would soon be trebled. I would have mentioned the thing before, but I didn't wish to mar this happy was on by speaking of such trifles."

What "Percy, dear," would have said next, had he dared, I'm afraid wouldn't look nice in print.

It didn't sooth his feelings to learn that Minnie Sparks, who didn't lose her money after all, having drawn it from Kyte & Co. the day before their failure, by the advice of Toby Squareman, married that gentleman shortly after. If Percy, dear, felt any consolation under the circumstances, it must have been of a nature akin to that de-rived by the fox from the sourcess of the grapes that hung above his reach.

A ton of cotton seed yields about 700 pounds of cake or meal, thirty-five gailons of oil, a few pounds of lint cot-ton, some ashes and other refuse.
