Thrown on the Streets.

"I say, Bill, this 'ere must be the house?" "It looks like it, Tommy, and a nice bit of a tumble-down shanty it is. I don't like this kind o' birness for a cint. Now, yesterday, when we turned out that millionalee on Fifth avenue, because he didn't come to time with his tent, I didn't object a bit. I loves to disposarsa real gentlemen." "Was old Tompkins a millionaire, Bill?" "In course he was. Why, Tommy, Tomp kins was worth his clean hundred thousand once, afore he dabbled in stocks in Wall street, and then he put his foot in it."

"In the stocks, Bill ?"

"Sartain, Tommy," "Then old Tompkins was like me, Billy, for I got in a bit of a scrape down in Delaware, and I had to put both my feet in the stocks."

"Let me see," said Bill drawing some legal papers from a capacious inside pocket of a heavy overcoat which had seen its best days at least a generation before.

"No, 76-this is the house-third floor. Whew, Tommy! Two flights of stairs to dray that furniture down-back room-Mrs. Livingston-warrant to dispossess-$5 rent, and $3.50 costs."

"Well, let's tackle the job, Bill, for we've got three more to attempt, and the arternoons are a leetle short in December. Lord ! How it snows, and that cold wind cuts like a knife. It must be down to snero!"

"Shero, Tommy, shero! If the folks up to Court heard you talk like that they'd laugh at you."

Up two rickety flights of stairs elimbed these two individuals, and under their united weight the stairs grouned audibly, as though in horror of the scene they were destined to witness, and the deed that was to be perpetrated. They had long been strangers to banisters, and as a substitute therefor these gentlemen grasped the laths on the wall, which had been so long uncovered that they were grimy and black from years of similar usage "This must be the room, Tommy; shall I knock ?"

"Knock! Why, Bill, yer ain't in the Fifth avenue now-burst the door in !" "But she may be a sleepin'." "Well, so much the better. It will wake her up. Delicate attentions does very well in highcalities, Billy, but in lowealities they ain't not appreciated for a cent." Grasping the handle, the one who had thus been addressed threw the immense weight of his ponderous body against the door. It had been a stranger to a lock for many a year, and, as it yielded unresistingly to the immense impetus of the burly fellow, he fell headlong into the room, striking his head heavily against the uncovered floor. Infuriated with pain, and wild with rage, he jumped hastily to his feet, and while he endeavored to stoop the flow of blood that besmeared his face, he fairly yelled at a pale-faced, matronly-looking lady, who sat shivering from the cold in a corner of the room futher from the window.

"Is you Mrs. Livingston?" "That's my name" replied the lady in a faint voice in which a tremor was plainly perceptible.

Then why don't you have carpet on your floor when gentlemen enter yer room, and not have 'em dash their brains ou! ?" "Gentlemen are not in the habit of entering moms as you did, sir," said Mrs. Livingsion, in the same tone of voice, fruitlessly endeavoring to restrain the fear which the unceremonious and unannounced entrance of the two men had caused. "Oh! Then we is infer that we is not gentlemen. Eh, Tommy ?" "Yes! We comes here to exercute the mandates of the law, and put this woman out who has cheated her honest landlord out of a month's rent; and I suppose we must be blacklegs. Eh, Billy?"

After the interchange of these choice bits of sarvasm the two laughed in unison, loud

"But I appeal to you both, if you have sters, if you havechildren, if you have fear of the justice of God, do not turn me out today," said Mrs. Livingston, appealing, with her attenuated body bent forward in supplication, and her hands clasped as if in the attitude of prayer.

"Oh! we've fetched yer to yer trumps, have we?" said Bill. "Here is this here warrant of dispossess-Thomson against Livingston-one month rent, $5; costs, $3.-50. Now is yer agoin' to pay it?" "Gentlemen! I beseech you. I have not get a cent. You see my condition, I have not tasted food for three days, and my limbs are almost benumbed with cold." "What's that got to do with us. We sin't a soup house, is we, Tommy ?" "No! Nor we don't keep no wood or coal yard, neither. You either pays it, or yer don't. If yer pays it, yer stays. If yer don't pay it, out yer go, bag and baggage." "But wait until to-morrow morning and I will gawithout a murmur. It is snowing terribly. Hear the wind how it shricks? Surely you would not turn me out upon the cold strents on such a day to freeze to death ?"

"No? We sin't a undertaker's shop." "Which of you gentlemen is the Marshal? Let me appeal to him."

"That don't consarn us. Eb, Tommy?"

"Neither on' us. We're his Deps-ain't we, Tommy ?" .

"Of course we is-that's just what we is, madam; we're his Deps."

"His Deps!" exclaimed Mrs. Livingston, with great earnestness of instance, anticipating something horrible. "His Deps! Oh!

what is that?" "Does yer hear that, Tommy? She don't know what a Dep is-why, we're the Marshal's Deputys; his right bowers." "He's got too soft a heart for this kind o' work," said Tommy. "He's a fool! that's just what he is. Half the time he pays the rent hisself, and then tells the landlord that some good sam-airy-tan paid it. We does the work now." "Hist the furniture, Tommy," seld Bill, as he seized a couple of chairs rudely to bear them to the sidewalk. "For God's sake, genlemen, forbear! I have pawned everything that I could bring myself to part with. What little I have left I cherish because they were the gifts of friends who have since died. If they are upon the street in this blinding storm they will be utterly ruined. Give me until morning?" "The money or the premises," said Tommy, as he seized a bed that lay in one corner of the room.

"Give me but a single hour, and perhaps I can raise the money," she said, beseech-

"Not one minute. Out they go !"

Down the creaking staircase they dragged what articles they had seized, through the narrow and dark hallway, out through the open door, and they never stopped until they had thrown them upon the cold snow that covered the street. Cold as it was, it was molten lead when compared with the hearts of these two individuals who bore the human form.

They returned to the room, but soon reappeared with other articles, and these they piled upon the first, or rather upon the snow, which, falling in dense clouds, had already nearly hidden the others from them. "She ain't got much, Bill, and there's no canpets tear to up, yer know."

"I wish there had been," said Bill, placing his hand upon his bruised face, from which the blood still flowed. Notwithstanding the inclement weather, the usual crowd had collected at the door to witness the operation, over which a tall policeman, with a large-sized club, presided. There was to be seen the usual sprinkling of women and boys, who, overawed by the bel-ligerent attitude of the officer, kept at a respectful distance. "And what's the matter, Mrs. Giles?" asked one exceedingly matronly-looking woman of her neighber.

"Only some woman trying to cheat her landlord of his honest rent," replied Mrs. Giles. "Serves her right, for not paying for it, Mrs. Giles," said the other; and, as she gathered her shawl tightly about her, the closed the cause of her appearance upon the the street in such a storm. The 'depa," carried their last load, and the entire household effects of Mrs. Living-long neck of a black bottle painfully disston were landed upon the sidewalk, During the entire operation she stood in the centre of the room, her eyes fixed on vacancy, her hands clasped, her breathing so faint as to be almost imperceptible, and with her pale, attenuated face she seemed to be the impersonation of a statue of despair.

If the men made rude remarks, she heard them not. While the goods were being removed she saw it not, for her mind was straying back to the golden past, to the summer day when she stood a happy bride befere the altar. She recalled the bright face of him who was her husband, his merry laugh, his cheering words, his loved embrace, and the happy, happy hours of the days gone by forever. She recalled the day when, with a Colonel's stripe upon his shoulder, he kissed her good-bye! and started for the war. The battles of the Wilderness, his death, her widowhood, down-down-down-to poverty, misery, despair-down an acclivity so deep it seemed to be bottomies -down an abyss that seemed to be unfathomable. "Come! Mrs. Livingston, you must go."

"Go!" she exclaimed, suddenly aroused from her reverie, and gazing wildly about "Yes, you've got to get out. Leave. Go.

Do you understand us now?" "Go I on I you do not mean to turn me out, too. Let me stay here to-night. I will lay upon the floor."

"Go! no yer don't. Yer can't play any sharp practice on me. If yer stays here to night it won't be a dispossess, and yer could just lug all that valuable furniture right in here again to-morrow in spite of us. Couldn't she, Tommy ?

"Of course she might. We must have the premises, and man and beast must go out. That's what the law mye, and what the law says, we does. Doesn't we, Billy to "But, gentlemen-"

"Oh! here, get out." And, seizing her, they ejected the unresisting creature, in a half-fainting condition, from the room. She descended the stair-case. She saw the eyes of her former neighbors glaring at
