A Holiday Memoir.

By Miss SIBANDA SINBAD.

Just twenty years ago, four of us, cousins,

Lon, Mamie, Bessie and myself, were paying a visit to uncle Zeke and aunt Becky Bein-campen, in the Parkemon valley. How quickly the time has flown away! I can scarcely realize that it has been twenty years, yet it is even so. The fact that my three cousins are married, and have brought up families of children—some of whom consider themselves young ladies and gentlemen tells a story that the happy flight of time cannot controvert. But, if I could smooth the few wrinkles which care has made on my brow, and pluck the silver threads from my hair, and as young to-day as I did then, and as happy; and I do not believe that my cousins, with their care-inspiring families, and I have a much to say, growing husbands, can say as much.

But, at the start, I have digressed from my purpose, for my plan was to commence with a description of uncle Zeke and aunt Becky, and of the holiday visit which we paid them.

Uncle Zeke Beincampen was one of the smoothest tempered, easiest-going, jolliest old farmers that you ever saw, and his round face was at all times an infallible revelation for the "blues." He lived in the Parkemon valley, in a large old-fashioned farm-house, which was buried in a grove of fruit and ornamental trees and grape-vines, and near which rippled the waters of Park-emon creek. To say that a large, handsome farm surrounded it, completes the picture.

Aunt Becky was almost like him, with one exception, that while uncle Zeke was generous and open-hearted, she was always of a more reserved nature, and looked upon the most trifling loss to her as an approaching misfortune, and seemed to live in constant dread of the poor-house.

With this social combination, it is not surprising that uncle Zeke was well to do in life, most of which he and aunt Becky had accumulated during many years of industry, frugality and wedded harmony, on the farm which we have described.

We had planned to spend Christmas with uncle Zeke and aunt Becky. We had never done so; and you may be sure that we cherished my bright anticipation of the fun we should have, during the two weeks we were engaged in packing up a large trunk to take with us in common, and otherwise getting ready for the trip.

Aunt Becky had written us to come without fail. She proposed to have a Christmas tree and a family feast next day. Her only daughter, who had married Prof. Metzger of Philadelphia, with her three children we had never seen, but she and she wished to have as many of the family—and especially ourselves—as possible. She would have John—her son—meet us with the carriage at Allentown, early in the morning before we started, while we were assembled to take account of stock, and think whether our trunk contained everything we were likely
