

DEATHS.

Dr. Henry Richard Linderman, Director of the United States Mint, died in Washington city, on Monday morning last.

Many persons in Mauch Chunk and Lehighton will remember the ebullient courage during the summer of 1854, strong men were stricken in the morning and carried to their graves in the afternoon, then it was that the now deceased physician showed the stuff that was in him.

Dr. G. B. Linderman, brother of deceased, (G. of Bethlehem), to combat singly with the terrible scourge. To all appearances the most vigorous were the first to succumb, the death rate was fearful, and the steepest hearts were appalled.

He was appointed Director of the Philadelphia Mint by President Johnson in 1857, and held that position until he was succeeded by Governor James Pollock, in 1869. In July following, he was selected by Hon. George S. Boutwell, then Secretary of the Treasury, to examine the Western mines and adjust some intricate balance questions.

He points out with great sagacity, certain facts which promise well for the South if her people will make proper use of their opportunities, and labor patiently to build up a new and healthy homogeneity of southern population will come.

Another source of considerable wealth to the South has arisen from the discovery of immense beds of phosphate rock and fossil bone in South Carolina. The manufacture of commercial fertilizers from these rocks and fossils has added greatly to the commerce of South Carolina.

It is a narrow and unsond philosophy, whether in the North or in the South, which sees in the bright prospects of the South a menace to the prosperity of the North. This country is one, and whatever enriches any part of it, whatever enables any part of it to sell more to the world for the world's money or the world's products, increases the prosperity of the whole land.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 27, 1878. During the past week Congress has just entered the rapids of its closing work. The rush is now very perceptible. The friends of each measure are striving to fix it in place for a hearing. The committees are pushing for a day on the floor. The preliminary systems of night sessions, which always precede a bill of a full day, have set in.

Without doubt it is the family-work of a master, and the reader finds his pleasure in a task with a deep regard that the able author has modestly sent forth this carefully wrought evidence of his genius, taste and deep insight into human motives, without a line of pretense. With the family-work, he looks the reader's sympathy and interest by his own unswerving faith in his narrative. The story, though sensational, is free from immorality and religious cant which were the works of fiction of this age.

J. D. Walker, Democrat, was elected U. S. Senator by the Arkansas Legislature on last Saturday.

THE SOUTH—Present and Future.

Mr. George W. Williams, a leading merchant and banker of Charleston, S. C., has taken pains to controvert with facts a number of pessimistic assumptions which have had a beneficial and paralyzing effect on the young men of the South.

The notion that white men cannot successfully till the soil in the Southern States, and its fellow-error that free negroes will not work with steadiness, he confronts with the fact that the cotton crop of 1873, which must have been cultivated and picked by somebody, is larger than any other ever grown, even when the labor of the negroes was compulsory.

He has never accepted these theories, indeed, and has been from the first so strongly convinced of the success of the South with free labor that he began to build great warehouses in Charleston for the storage of cotton immediately after the war ended. His friends remonstrated with him, predicting "that cotton could not be produced by white labor, and that the negroes would not work."

"I did not believe any such doctrine," he says, and in vindication of the soundness of his judgment he points to his overflowing warehouses, which are in capable of holding the cotton which he has need to store. Mr. Williams' confidence in the industry of the negroes and in their disposition to work harmoniously with the whites for the good of the country and for their own prosperity by legitimate means is unshaken.

He points out with great sagacity, certain facts which promise well for the South if her people will make proper use of their opportunities, and labor patiently to build up a new and healthy homogeneity of southern population will come.
