Ursula's Love.

It was a dark, stormy day without, but inside all was warmth and light, and as I sat in my arm chair and looked at the girl before me, I felt that not withstanding all the warmth and light, how much pleaster my home might be. I had just recovered from a long illness which had left me as weak as a baby, so I had advertised for a companion, and here before me was the thirtieth applicant for that position. A young fellow seemed almost out of place in my lone house, where I, Miss Dorothy Morrey, spinster, had been the sole occupant for so many years.

How Stella did oppose my plan of a companion. She seemed to want to come to me herself—I suppose thinking that as Harold, her step son, was my chosen heir, it was the proper thing for her to do. But I didn't agree to that; not for the world would I have to live with a person like Stella. Vanity and arrogance were her chief characteristics, and those qualities I detested.

This young girl who had come just as I had begun to despair of ever finding what I wanted, had a strange fascination for me. Her small child-like figure was clothed in mourning; her face was fair and sweet, though very sad, and her deep hazel eyes had that tender, longing look we see sometimes in the little ones early called home.

So I questioned her, and was pleased with her timid answers, and before long I said: "Well, my dear, I think you feel like living with a cranky old woman, I should like to have you. What is your name?"

"Ursula," she answered.

"Ursula, what was your Harold's last name?"

"It was Kent."

For a long time we sat quietly, then: "Ursula," I said, "do you know who sends you out, and why he sends it?"

The pure face and his mournful look, and surely the angels must have some such expression, as she answered fervently: "Those whom the Lord loveth, He chasteneth. 'O! Miss Dorothy, thank my heart. Here was the faith that 'moved mountains.'"

That afternoon I mailed one of my rare letters.

I think Ursula felt happy after her conference in me, and every day brought us closer to each other until I shuddered at I thought of what my house was before she came, and what it would be if she ever left it.

A few days went by; we were in a library in the twilight—Ursula and I—I sitting in my favorite easy chair by the window, while my knitting dropped from my hands as I listened to the bird-like voice singing that sweet old-fashioned ballad: "Auld Robin Gray." The window was open, and the soft air filtered through the room, wafting in the fragrance of the rose and honey-suckles. Just then the garden gate opened and a man's figure slowly came up the path.

He paused. Sweetly the young voice sang out its pathetic strains. Then swiftly ascending the steps he came through the open hall door. Unconsciously, Ursula sang on and I, in my window did not move.

Attracted by the magnetism that there always is in a steady gaze, Ursula looked up.

There was a silence in the room for a moment, and then with one quivering cry, like a bird who has found its mate, she was clasped in her Harold's outstretched arms. Then he spoke: "Oh my darling! my love! Ursula! Why did you leave me so cruelly? I have searched and searched for you, knowing from my mother what caused your note and departure, but all in vain, until I received your letter from Aunt Dorothy, telling me to 'Come, you were here.' Oh, little one, how I have longed for you!"

I stepped forward, and Ursula turned still in her lover's arms, and looked at me a moment. Then she understood all.

"Yes, Ursula," I said, "I am the aunt whose brother Harold Kent is, and now my darling, the wish of my heart is gratified; there will be no need of your leaving me."

I went to her. She was in her room, and as I entered I knew my face showed my thoughts, but before I could speak she threw her arms around my neck and hid her face on my shoulder.

As I felt the supple young form pressed close to mine, and the touch of the soft cheek, my arms folded involuntarily around her, and my anger was hushed.

Together we sat down, and then turning the fearful face from against my shoulder, and looking straight into her sad eyes, I asked her: "Ursula, why were you so cruel? Why could your heart fail to respond to one so worthy in every way of a woman's love?"

A deep burning flush passed over her face, and for a moment she hesitated, then drawing a little away from my encircling arm she told me all her story, and I learned why she was the young eyes had always seemed so mournful.

"Oh, my dear friend," she said, "you cannot help me; but you have been so kind, I feel as if I had been wrong in keeping a secret from you. From my early childhood I was reared in affluence, with every care an indulgent father could lavish upon me. My father was a lawyer, and just as I grew to womanhood he took to his office a young clerk, the son of a widow lady, who he knew well. We met here in the street, and where I felt, during the next few days, a strong attraction for the man, but he was so poor, and I was so rich, that I could not love each other. His noble, true nature made me give him such an adoring love that his shared with him would have seemed but pleasure. We were betrothed with our parents' full consent. But then my dear father died, and in a little time, with my girl yet a child, still fresh and plump, his lawyer still fresh and plump, was not withstanding all the warmth and light, how much pleaster my home might be. I had just recovered from a long illness which had left me as weak as a baby, so I had advertised for a companion, and here before me was the thirtieth applicant for that position. A young fellow seemed almost out of place in my lone house, where I, Miss Dorothy Morrey, spinster, had been the sole occupant for so many years. How Stella did oppose my plan of a companion.
