MIRA CONE'S LOVERS.

"You will marry the old grey-headed man, Mira, much as you assert the impossibility of such a thing."

"No, indeed, Nellie! Not while hand-some as Harry Murray is in the field."

"But Mr. Grafton is rich—elderly, but a true type of one of nature's gentlemen."

"Yes; but one would like to know the original color of his hair; sandy, though, I judge, from his skin," replied Mira, laughing.

Nellie Clay had met Mr. Grafton the evening before, and had introduced by Mira. After his rather lengthy call he had told her he was in search of a wife, was a widower and wealthy.

"His eyes followed you, Mira, wherever you went. But tell me about Harry; you know I have never met my cousin that is to be."

"Oh, he is indelible—as handsome as a picture. But yonder he comes—judge for yourself!"

Before Nellie could reply the object of her conversation stood before her, and an introduction followed. They did not enter the house but remained on the vine-covered porch, where the roses were nodding in the evening breeze, scenting the air with their sweet perfume.

The full moon, riding in the clear blue sky, sent her soft light down, and illuminated the scene with beauty.

Farmer Cone sat with them a half hour, then went to the sitting-room in search of a cigar. Years and hard work had not lessened his love for her, nor made him linger away from her side when the day's work was done.

They were a singularly happy family, and more fortunate than the average farmer in their home comforts. The two sons, older than Mira, were married and followed their professions as a physician, and the other a minister of the gospel.

Mira was eighteen, and a younger brother, named Joseph, not quite sixteen, made up the family.

"Did I exaggerate?" asked Mira of Nellie, after they had retired to their room.

"No, he is charming; although too intelligent to follow a plow. I would not permit it, if I were you."

"He will hire the rough work done, and farm on scientific principles. He has attended an agricultural college for two years, and thinks he can make farming a success."

"I should think you would like a change. Much as I like a summer visit to the country, it must be very dull in winter. How do you spend the long evenings, without lectures, concerts, parties, operas and theatres?"

"Oh, we never think of such things, and find plenty of enjoyment in reading, and sociality with the neighbors."

"But Mr. Grafton has a fine city mansion and plenty of money. How can you hesitate between city and country life, when the former offers wealth and ease and the latter poverty and hard work? I wish Grafton would transfer his love to me; can't you intimate that I am in the market?"

"Yes, if you are in earnest. But you must not trifle with him, he is too good for that."

"Always pay as you go, Tommy," said an old man to his nephew. "But, uncle, suppose I haven't anything to pay with?"

"Then, don't go, Tommy."

"Somewhat charges a certain editor, a short distance up the valley, while being a 'pious fraud.' We know him and believe the charge unjust. We move to amend by striking out the word 'pious.'"

"What are you prowling around my hen-roost at this hour of the night for?"

"I am here to see if you are a farmer or a thief."

"I am a farmer, and I am a thief."

"I am a farmer, and I am a thief."

"I am a farmer, and I am a thief."
