A Heart History.

They never hever tell

Pacing up and down the narrow limits o her room, as she had paced for more than an hour, Agnes Carew tried to realize the now future which to-day had enddenly opened before her its unfamiliar vista. Her whole life, for the past six years, had been swayed by one ambition. To-day at twenty years of age, she had renounced it, for Hugh Loring had asked her to become his wife This winter was to have marked her debut on the operatic stage. It had been the raidant, glimmering light illuminating the toilsome path up which she had so laboriously struggled, in making artistically perfeet the glorious voice with which nature had ordained her.

Her efforts had been growned with rare mecess. Already rumors of her prowess And she? were whispered abroad, but all this was before Hugh Doring's wooing, and to-day she had given him her promise to become his

It had not been without a struggle; but her mother, glad, proud, and ambitious, longert said, "Was she mad, to hesitate?" and her voice turned the scale.

She had hardly time to learn to love him. so impetuous had been his wooing; and yet to-day, wondering if her decision had been the right one, the memory of his brown eyes lighting up as they rested on her face, the scho of his words seemed to thrill her heart and fill it with peace. A week later-only a week-her lover ame to her, his handsome face white and drawn with pain. There had been a sudden crisis in the commercial world, and at the hotch. Agnes, what a grand success of the county for about two years, did farmhis vast fortune had been swept away in the malestrom of ruin. As Agnes listened to the story, the pallor on his cheek reflected itself on hers. "I shall have to begin the world over gain, my darling," he said. "Agnes, do you love me well enough to begin it with me, or will you wait?" "I would only hamper your efforts, Hugh," she answered. "Let me do as I had at first intended. I know now, by the sudden hope within me, how near my heart my life's dream has been. Let me live it for a little while. Then, when you are ready for me, I will give it up and come back to you."

o, spite of his protestations, it cided. The ambition Agnes had renounced, sprang hydra-headed into her existence. Could it be that she did not share Hugh's disappointment? Ah, if so, the night of her debut swept it all away-the night when she saw the public at her feet, when she carried them with her, up into the very realms of heaven, with the clear, flute-like tones; only to be called back to earth, on its dying not, to learn of my happinds when it is asechoes, by the thundering waves of applause that followed. Ah, could she have given this up? Even to give back Hugh his fortune, and to share his proud name, could she have renounced this life? In six months, a brilliant offer came to her to go abroad. Hugh wrote to her, as follows:

"I dare not ask you to renounce it. As yet I can offer you so little. But, oh, my love, if you will but stay." Agnes answered : "I cannot, Hugh. Forgive, me dear, but I have faced poverty all my life. I should only be wretched and make you so. Let me try my wings a little longer; then, when I am weary, I will fly home to the nest you will be all this time building for me."

Strong man though Hugh Loring was, two bitter, blinding tears fell on the little this weary year had gladdened her eyes lysheet which held these words. The news which came to hitti after this, of her continued triumphs, was hateful to him. Her letters were filled with her pressent life. Of the past and future, she said hothing.
