BEGGING.

Battling with hunger, How many we meet, Footsore and frozen, Wandering through the street; Weary and drowsy, Pleading for bread, Houseless and starving— No rest for the head; Cold—cold—nothing to eat, Ragged and shivering, Wandering the street.

Battling with hunger,

From morning till eve, Scarcely "a bite" to be had; The outlook all gloom, Trudging through snow, In weary creeping, Onward they go, Cold—cold—nothing to eat; Wretched and hungry, Wandering the street.

Battling with hunger,

Wandering through snow, Battling for bare life, Withing life speed; Hearts aching sore, Hard in their pain, Groaning in gutter, Cold—cold—nothing to eat; Cold—cold—nothing to eat; All alone in the world, Scarcely "a bite" to be had.

Battling with hunger,

Hard is their fate, Pleading and tramping Early and late; Oh, list to the prayer, Of the wandering poor, And don't thrust the beggar Away from your door, Cold—cold—out in the rain, To seek a living, Begging again.

THE BLIZZARD.

I had often heard the wind blizzard used in the East without knowing exactly what it meant, nor did I know whether it had the dignity of a place in Webster's unbridged, nor did I care, as I never supposed I should use it.

It was not till I went to the great North-west, and found myself a denizen of its metropolis, St. Paul, that I discovered that it had, in Minnesota, at least, a significant meaning.

Not long after my arrival I asked a friend the purport of the word as they used it; he looked at me as though I was quizzing him, and said, "Do I understand you to say you don't know what we mean by a blizzard?"

"Honor bright," said I, "I don't know." "Well, you Eastern people are very ignorant," said he.

I pleaded guilty to ignorance, and was told to wait till next winter and I would find all about it.

"I may die or get well before then," I persisted. "People don't die here, and the climate will do you so much good you'll stay." I gave him up.

To another friend I said: "What's a blizzard?" He, too, seemed surprised at the question, and after a little hesitation said: "It's a kind of storm we have here. It comes like a well, like a regular blizzard."

It was something, but not very definite, and I was prepared for a more extended description, but he told me to wait till I saw one, and then I would be thoroughly satisfied.

Some weeks after this, as I was going through a cemetery I saw a tombstone in memory of an entire family, and this was the laconic epitaph: "Caught in a great blizzard in 1873." I was getting on here when the tangible results of a blizzard if nothing more, and I began to have some respect for the word.

My friend number one was right, for I did not die, and the climate did me good and I found out to my entire satisfaction what a blizzard was.

I hope I may do better for my readers in describing it than my friends did by me. In the early part of the winter I found myself in the northwestern part of Minnesota. I drove one day fifteen miles from the railway to a small town to see an old friend. My visit was over, I was about to return; in fact had my overcoat on, and had ordered the team, when a neighbor came in. He said: "Stranger, you had better not start; there's going to be a blizzard, or I'm no judge."

"That's exactly what I want," exclaimed I. "I'll find out what it is, if I'm caught in one."

"And to your sorrow," said I, "I'm caught in one." "Pull off your coat, if Mr. P. says there is going to be a blizzard you can't leave your house until it is over; he knows all about it and the weather; he is our weather bureau in this section, and he can tell you all about blizzards; for he has lived in Minnesota for thirty years."

The result was, I was not persuaded but ordered to stay till the weather prophet and the weather were more favorable.

I determined to let it be on my own lighted on the whole subject.

"Well," said neighbor P. "everybody begins with 'well' when they speak on this subject." "If I was to tell you of some things I have seen you would not believe me."

"Give me your first experience," said I, to get at something definite and this time I was successful. I won't try to give it in neighbor P.'s language exactly, as it would take too long.

"I was living in one of the southern counties. I was alone in my house, and I had a large fire in the stove, and I was sitting in a large seat, covered with heavy woolen clothes, and I was reading a book, and I was very comfortable. I had a good fire in the stove, and I was sitting in a large seat, covered with heavy woolen clothes, and I was reading a book, and I was very comfortable.

"I had just turned the page, and I was sitting in a large seat, covered with heavy woolen clothes, and I was reading a book, and I was very comfortable. I had a good fire in the stove, and I was sitting in a large seat, covered with heavy woolen clothes, and I was reading a book, and I was very comfortable.

"I could carry this on for pages and tell of many wonderful escapes and of frightful sufferings; but it is not necessary. I have merely written this to tell my Eastern friends what a blizzard is like.

I will mention one more instance, it was told me by a gentleman who saw all the parties. It happened in the one which I was in, and in which Mr. Storck was frozen. It was a case of true love, like all such cases did not run smooth. The storm passed, after the manner of the stern parents of the far West, told the young man that if he saw his mother he would shoot her dead. It was a case of true love, like all such cases did not run smooth.

But if parents in the West are dangerous the young men are gone, at least this one was for her own sake with the girl. They made for a young and thriving town by a circuitous route to mislead the shooting father. He, however, was smart as well as stern, for he took a short cut for the same place, and the result might have been bloody but for the unexpected blizzard.

This time the ill wind blew for the lovers—it overtook both their parent and child. The former got through to the town with nose and ears frozen; the latter were caught on the prairie and, as it was impossible to proceed, found a hollow, got under it and, wrapped in the buffalo robe, suffered the snow to drift over them. Here they passed two nights, and strange to say, did not freeze.

By way of a short digression, I would say that this is the usual result when caught in one of these storms. The horses, relieved from the burden of the sled, frequently reach some house, and this warning is given and each searched for by the owner. This winter a man was found frozen in the act of turning over his horse. He was
