Grace Thorntey had been married a year when the civil war bigun, and lived in a pleasant cottage with her husband, who was a fine tooking, taw-ny-whiskered young fellow of twentyfive, as fond as a man citild be of his wife, and as well liked by everybody as he was wholesouled and lovable.

Grace was nineteen, a pretty, blueeyed, yellow-haired little creature whose only fault was a growing tendency to be inordinately jealous of her husband, if he so much as glanced at a lady who, to the charms of youth added the capti vating spell of beauty, She loved Will Thornley dearly, but at the same time Will's smiles must all be for her and nobody else, and he must think her just perfection in every-thing, whether she really was or not, and never must be by any possible chance hint that any woman living was half so lovely, good or wise, as her own exacting, impulsive little self. Will, being a young husband and very much in love with his wife, was quite willing to admit, and for a time

sincerely believed, that Grace was an angel, and they were as bappy as two turtle doves, or a pair of newly mated swans, until Rose Woodward came to pay them a visit. Before Grace's marriage, Rose had been her most intimate friend, and she naturally looked forward to her coming and Will had often stood in the old, naturally looked forward to her coming

It was not long before Rose guessed what was passing in Mrs. Thornley's mind, and shaped her conduct accordingly. It was a trifle embarrassing, Private Thorries soon won for him mirable tact, and managed to adopt a safe middle course, privately vowing, however, to make her visit as short as possible, and take good care not to respect to the safe middle course, and the safe middle course, privately vowing.
