HIGH FARMING -WHAT IS IT? - To be brief, a it growing of the best crops on the best coll under the best conditions; and, finally, he crop giving the best profit in return?— No. There are cases when a comparatively por crop grown on a poor soll with little or no attention, may give the best returns -as s the case in the imperative extensive farming of a new country. High farming is when mach capital is spent on little land for the production of large crops of great value. The production of beef on the plains may be as profitable as the growing of onions, but it is not high farming—it is the character of the culture the sull receives, and not the profit, that determines whether farming is high or low. High farming is the profitable farming of old, thickly settled countries, and the kind that we are tending to just the profit of the kind that we are tending to just the profit of the kind that we are tending to just the profit of the kind that we are tending to just the profit of the kind that we are tending to just the profit of the kind that we are tending to just the profit of the kind that we are tending to just the profit of the kind that we are tending to just the profit of the kind that we are tending to just the profit of the kind that we are tending to just the profit of the kind that we are tending to just the profit of the kind that we are tending to just the profit of the kind that we are tending to just the profit of the kind that we are tending to just the profit of the kind that we are tending to just the control of the state.
