It had assessed as if this were no idle boost. Years greater knovery in every department of the povernment, than this country had ever seen again, did not seem to skare the confidence of the great mass of Republican voters, in the perfect patriotism and complete integrity of the party. Until now they had stood by their colors defiantly, obeying the orders of their commanders with singular fidelity. If we must give these voters credit for ordisary intelligence, how can they excuse their support of an administration like Grant's whose domination marked an era of jobbery unprecedented in the history of political parties; how could they bonestly support Hayes who was placed in the Presidential chair by the most monstrous fraud ever perpetrated on a free people, or conscientiously help elect to the Presidency James A. Conkling precipitated the trouble in his party by resigning his position in a fit of anger, because Garfield declined to keep his promise. He miscalculated his political strength. He had fishishly imagined that he would have no difficulty in securing his return to the Senate, by an overwhelming vote of confidence. He might have been had he been differently equipped; but he had nothing to offer his old constituency, but a distinguished personality and an ornate eloquency, while the Administration held out the more alluring inducement of bread and binter in the form of fat official positions.
