WISHING.

BY MYRTLE. While thinking oft, we wish, then pause, Wild dreams imagination cross; We wish, we surely know not what— Perhans there lies some other spot. Where greener grows the grass or moss.

And oft we like the children cry, For something that should never lie, Within the path we tread. Is vain Each wish-since all our wishes gain Not love nor lands-and shadows die.

Then wherefore do we mortals wish, If each must thus fade and vanish, How swift imagination's glow, Finds ever a dreamless finish? We wish, and fast as shadows fiv.

The breathed words scarce live to die; Oft as they die we build again, While still no remnants e'er remain, To tell where all the vanished lie. If all we wished were still to be, What wondrous panorama see! How oddly would we run the world— Some'd want it hot, some'd want it cold!

No two we'd meet would e'er agree.
