Phoebe Mays was Farmer Mapes' bound girl. This fact alone explains why her life was a hard one, for Farmer Mapes was no easy master-penurious, grasping and exempt from the feelings of charity and forbearance.

But Phoebe had plenty of courage, and sunny nature on which sorrow rested but lightly. Had this not been the case every spark of spirit would have been crushed from her generous young heart long ago.

It was a dark night but oppressively warm. There was no moon up, and the sky was obscured with clouds. Phoebe had carried a dozen fresh eggs to Deacon Baily's about a mile and a half from the farm, and was returning home the long-

She waiked through the fields gaily, her torn straw hat pushed back on her short, black curls; her warm brunette skin flushed with exercise. A feeling of freedom pervaded her.

In the silent night, with the vast heavens above, and only the solemn croaking of the frogs disturting the calm peace, Phoebe's buoyant heart was happy. She skipped along, touching the tall clover with her birch switch, and singing

"I suppose they will raise a row because I'm so late. But let them, I'm used to that! I can stand it!" she thought with a gay little laugh.
