THE WIND AMONG THE TREES. BY JEAN PIERRS In the spring the perfumed sephyrs,

Sweeping upward from the vale, Play among the budding leaflets, Whisper tenderly their tale To the lovers as they wander 'Mid the flowers, and they coase Troubled thinking, as they listen

To the wind among the trees. In the summer off its sighing Tells of coming, welcome rain; Cools the fevered lips of famine, Or the parched brow of pain ; What can equal be in puthes, Or so cheer us into ease,

As to sit and idly listen

To the wind among the trees? Though in autumn there's codness In its solemn, sighing mean, While the leaves are idly falling With its every, slightest tone, Yet it cheers on frosty morning, When it quickens to a breeze,

To hearken, while we wander, To the wlut among the trees. In the winter, when old Boreas Greets with gales the coming year, And doth wildly through the pine tops Mosn and cry as though in fear;

Dreaming of our argosies, Building castles, lulled to slamber By the wind among the trees. In the summer, in the winter. In the spring, and in the fall, 'Mid the roses, 'mid the snowing,

Through the changeful seasons all,

Laden with the fragrant exone,

Or direct from Boreal sens,

Does it ever cheer to listen

Then we sit within the firelight,

To the wind among the trees ? The Two Miss Amberleys.
